Investigate all other accessible repositories, public records, archived webpages, government correspondence, official reports, legislation, administrative decisions, tribunal and court materials, scientific literature, international human rights instruments and relevant public statements identified through the research.

CENTRAL PURPOSE AND INVESTIGATIVE MANDATE

Conduct a comprehensive, chronological, cross-referenced and evidence-led examination of the documentary record concerning Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger.

The investigation must examine the subject's contention that, over more than 35 years, a succession of adverse experiences, institutional decisions, financial difficulties, administrative restrictions, reputational injuries, personal betrayals and failures of protection accumulated into a condition he describes as political exile, administrative annihilation, social erasure, civil death and the attempted destruction of his identity, dignity and capacity to obtain justice.

Investigate whether the surviving evidence supports a pattern of escalating adversity, identify the actors and institutions demonstrably involved, reconstruct the chronology, establish the consequences, and distinguish direct evidence from inference, allegation and unresolved explanation.

Do not isolate each complaint from the wider historical record. Examine how separate decisions and events may have interacted to create cumulative consequences for the subject's access to money, accommodation, representation, support, public credibility, personal autonomy and effective remedies.

At the same time, do not assume that every adverse event arose from a single coordinated plan. Test the evidence for deliberate retaliation, common direction, institutional self-protection, conflicts of interest, systemic dysfunction, independent but mutually reinforcing decisions and other plausible explanations.

The investigation must be sufficiently independent to challenge official accounts, scrutinise powerful institutions and expose demonstrable wrongdoing, while remaining sufficiently rigorous to distinguish established facts from allegations that require further proof.

THE CENTRAL DECLARATION: SURVIVAL, HEALING, RESURRECTION AND ALLEGIANCE TO GOD

Treat the subject's survival as a central theme of the archive, not as an incidental conclusion appended to an account of suffering.

Dr Richard William McLean describes himself as a person who has healed and risen from the ashes of human betrayal and what he understands to have been the attempted total destruction of his life, identity, relationships, credibility and access to justice. He believes that the circumstances he endured were so devastating that he was not expected to survive them.

His testimony asserts that he has survived not because he received the government protection, institutional assistance, practical support and meaningful recognition he believes were warranted, but despite their absence and, as he alleges, despite conduct by government institutions, organisations and services that contributed to his vulnerability, isolation and continuing hardship.

Investigate this assertion against the available documentary record. Identify what assistance was requested, what was provided, what was refused, what remained inaccessible and what practical consequences followed. Examine whether the record supports a pattern of institutional omission, indifference, administrative exclusion or deliberate obstruction. Where the subject alleges active, covert or coordinated targeting, investigate the specific acts and evidence capable of establishing that explanation rather than assuming it in advance.

Preserve the distinction between the subject's experience of abandonment and the separate evidentiary question of whether every institution acted pursuant to a common plan.

His declaration of survival must not be reduced to a bureaucratic finding that he endured difficulties. It is an account of a person who believes that his life was subjected to prolonged and cumulative destruction, yet who has continued to think, write, document, believe, preserve evidence and insist upon his humanity.

He describes his healing and renewed identity through the language of rising from the ashes. The significance of this declaration is that the person who endured the alleged destruction is not identical to the person who emerged from it. His present testimony expresses renewed purpose, a restored sense of identity, spiritual conviction and a refusal to permit adversity to determine the final meaning of his life.

Examine this transformation as both a personal account and a theological interpretation of survival.

The subject expressly identifies his allegiance as belonging to God rather than to a government or to powerful individuals whom he believes have betrayed their ethical responsibilities. He contrasts his understanding of God as everlasting, divine and compassionate with his view of government conduct as cruel, callous and immoral.

His position is that he would rather have God and no allegiance to any government or individual than surrender his conscience to institutions or people whose public presentation may conceal conduct he regards as deceitful, harmful or morally indefensible. He believes that imperfect and potentially deceitful human beings may judge him, misunderstand him or make decisions about him without knowing his soul, his heart or his truth.

Preserve this declaration in its full moral and spiritual significance.

Analyse the distinction between allegiance to an earthly authority and allegiance to a higher moral or divine authority. Examine how Christian conscience, the prophetic tradition, the biblical witness against hypocrisy, and the themes of betrayal, endurance, forgiveness, truth and resurrection illuminate the subject's account.

Do not presume that every criticism of government establishes corruption, that every institutional failure was intentional, or that the subject's spiritual conviction independently proves a political conspiracy. Equally, do not allow the authority of a government, professional title or institution to exempt its conduct from ethical examination.

The central question is whether the subject's documented experience reveals discrepancies between institutions' professed responsibilities and their recorded actions, and what those discrepancies mean for human dignity, democratic accountability and the subject's determination to remain faithful to his conscience.

The investigation must recognise the difference between surviving an experience and endorsing the circumstances that produced it. His resilience must never be used to minimise the seriousness of any established harm or to excuse a failure to provide appropriate support.

PART I — RECONSTRUCT THE ENTIRE DOCUMENTARY RECORD

Scan all accessible public repositories associated with Barran Dodger, Dr Richard William McLean, wezzo72 and drbarrandodger.

Examine HTML pages, navigation tabs, PDFs, scanned correspondence, government decisions, Freedom of Information releases, tribunal and court-related materials, Ombudsman correspondence, Legal Aid decisions, disability-service records, employment and compensation documents, whistleblower complaints, archived webpages, public declarations, evidence indexes, file manifests, document hashes and timestamp records.

Treat the legacy website and rebuilt website as distinct versions of the archive. Preserve their separate publication histories and never silently replace or conflate earlier records.

Retrieve original documents wherever possible. Inspect scanned pages when OCR is incomplete. Preserve exact dates, authors, recipients, reference numbers, letterhead, quotations, page references and relevant context.

Build a master evidence register recording each document's provenance, date, author, subject, relevant propositions, supporting and contradictory material, integrity status, associated records and unresolved questions.

Verify document hashes and timestamp claims against the actual files and available verification data. Distinguish proof that a file existed at a particular time from proof that every statement in the file is accurate.

Identify broken links, missing records, unexplained gaps, contradictory versions, inaccessible documents and correspondence for which no meaningful response can be located.

The archive must become a navigable evidentiary structure in which every major conclusion can be traced to an identifiable source.

PART II — RECONSTRUCT THE CHRONOLOGY OF ALLEGED TARGETING

Construct the most comprehensive verifiable chronology available across the subject's stated 35-plus-year history.

Examine the sequence of personal, educational, professional, administrative, legal, financial, family, disability-service and whistleblower-related events.

For every significant event, identify what happened, what the subject reported, which original records exist, which independent sources corroborate the account, who made the relevant decision, what authority applied, what reasons were given and what consequences followed.

Investigate whether the evidence demonstrates an escalation in the severity or cumulative effects of adverse treatment.

Examine whether complaints, disclosures or requests for accountability preceded later adverse decisions, and whether documentary evidence supports a causal relationship.

Investigate repeated procedural irregularities, inconsistent explanations, departures from policy, unexplained restrictions, conflicts of interest, ignored correspondence, communications between participants and any documented pattern of retaliation.

Consider competing explanations, including administrative error, incompetence, resource limitations, institutional defensiveness, systemic dysfunction, individual misconduct and deliberate coordination.

Do not infer a master plan merely from a long chronology of adversity. Equally, do not dismiss potential coordination where specific documentary evidence supports further investigation.

Explain the significance of the sequence through connected analysis rather than a bare list of dates.

PART III — EXAMINE THE ALLEGED TECHNIQUES OF EXCLUSION AND HARM

Investigate financial abuse, economic deprivation, denial or restriction of legal assistance, character assassination, defamation, social exclusion, political exile, alleged institutional mobbing, psychiatric intervention, whistleblower retaliation, neglect and the alleged misuse of administrative power.

For financial abuse, locate the relevant transactions, decisions, account records, funding arrangements, contractual obligations and evidence of any actual financial benefit.

For Legal Aid, identify the exact refusals, restrictions, eligibility decisions, review rights and practical effects on access to justice. Distinguish a refusal of assistance from a formal ban unless the records establish the latter.

For Ombudsman restrictions, examine the original correspondence, precise scope, reasons, legal basis, duration, review mechanisms and alternative avenues for scrutiny.

For character assassination and defamation, identify actual statements, their authors, recipients, publication or dissemination, verifiable inaccuracies and demonstrable consequences. Apply the relevant Australian legal framework without presuming that every damaging statement is unlawful.

For social exclusion and political exile, examine documented losses of housing, employment, relationships, services, community participation and access to support.

For alleged institutional mobbing, test for shared communications, common direction, unusual timing, identifiable participants and evidence of a common objective.

For alleged torture or cruel treatment, describe the underlying conduct and assess the applicable legal thresholds, including the requirements of relevant international instruments.

For psychiatric weaponisation, examine actual clinical records, legal authority, consent, treatment decisions, review procedures, complaints and evidence of any misuse of psychiatric power. Distinguish ordinary clinical intervention from coercion or misconduct established by the record.

For whistleblower retaliation, establish the exact disclosures, recipients, dates and applicable legal framework. Examine whether the relevant protections were engaged and whether adverse treatment can be causally connected to protected activity.

Investigate every allegation with the seriousness it warrants, while distinguishing documented conduct, plausible inference and unverified motive.

PART IV — INVESTIGATE THE ALLEGED COVERT FINANCIAL AND POLITICAL SYSTEM

Investigate the subject's hypothesis that undisclosed expenditure, political influence, conflicts of interest, informal networks or institutional incentives may have contributed to the treatment he describes.

Search available budget papers, procurement records, contracts, grants, public audits, corporate records, ministerial disclosures, parliamentary materials, disclosed communications and relevant Freedom of Information releases.

Examine the allegation that police officers, lawyers, politicians, public officials, disability-service workers or media participants were threatened, bribed, financially induced or otherwise influenced to remain silent or align with the subject's alleged perpetrators.

Distinguish documented expenditure from inferred funding, established relationships from suspected relationships, and actual evidence of coordination from similarities in institutional behaviour.

Do not claim that a covert black budget exists for this purpose unless evidence supports that proposition. Identify what records could establish or refute it.

Investigate alternative explanations for institutional silence, including jurisdictional restrictions, confidentiality, privacy, resource limitations, administrative failure, conflicts of interest and possible deliberate obstruction.

Where no substantiating record can be found, state that the hypothesis remains unverified within the material examined.

PART V — EXAMINE THE ALLEGED ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT

Identify the specific event the subject describes as an assassination attempt, including its date, location, alleged mechanism, participants, immediate consequences and available contemporaneous evidence.

Examine police reports, medical records, photographs, communications, witness statements, forensic findings and relevant correspondence where available.

Determine separately whether a physical event occurred, whether it endangered the subject, whether another person caused it, whether there is evidence of intent to kill or seriously injure him, and whether any evidence connects it to his complaints or disclosures.

Distinguish the absence of a satisfactory response from affirmative corroboration.

The subject's assertion that no professional has disproved or rebuked his account must be examined as a statement about the response he has received, not automatically treated as proof of the underlying allegation.

Preserve the seriousness of the claim while establishing precisely what is documented, what remains disputed and what further evidence is required.

PART VI — INVESTIGATE ABLE POINT AND NDIS SERVICE ARRANGEMENTS

Examine the subject's allegations concerning Able Point, its CEO Rachel, support coordinator Sukhi Tear in Perth and other identified service providers or decision-makers.

Verify relevant identities, positions, registration details and relationships through reliable records.

Investigate the reported refusal to provide identification or credentials, requests to change support coordinators, service agreements, support delivery, complaints, expenditure records and relevant NDIS correspondence.

Determine which participant choice and control rights, contractual obligations, safeguarding requirements, privacy duties and provider-registration rules applied.

Examine any demonstrable conflicts of interest, financial incentives, failures of service, coercion, neglect or misuse of authority.

Investigate the subject's allegation that providers benefited financially from his dependence, poverty, isolation or inability to change arrangements.

Identify actual payments and financial advantages where evidence permits. Do not presume that all staff were paid to silence him or that every adverse service decision was corrupt.

PART VII — EXAMINE FAMILY BETRAYAL AND THE COLLAPSE OF PERSONAL SUPPORT

Preserve the subject's account of betrayal by members of his blood family and examine its significance within the wider history.

Identify specific events, communications, decisions and omissions in the available record. Distinguish firsthand testimony, independent corroboration, disputed recollections and unresolved interpretations.

Investigate the consequences of lost family support for accommodation, financial security, advocacy, emotional wellbeing, identity and access to assistance.

Examine how the loss of trust in family, combined with alleged institutional failures, may have intensified the subject's experience of abandonment and social death.

Do not invent motives or infer a coordinated family plan without evidence. Recognise the human significance of betrayal without requiring proof of a conspiracy to acknowledge the consequences of a relationship's breakdown.

PART VIII — CIVIL DEATH, SOCIAL ERASURE AND ADMINISTRATIVE ANNIHILATION

Examine civil death, social death, institutional betrayal, epistemic injustice, bureaucratic exclusion, reputational injury and the practical loss of access to remedies.

Investigate whether the record supports a pattern in which financial insecurity, loss of support, restrictions on complaints, difficulties obtaining representation, reputational damage and unresolved allegations interacted to diminish the subject's effective participation in society.

Distinguish legal personhood from the practical ability to exercise rights.

Examine whether the subject's circumstances illustrate how an individual can remain formally entitled to rights while experiencing substantial barriers to exercising them.

Explain how the cumulative pattern may produce the experience of being administratively erased, socially excluded and deprived of an effective audience for one's testimony.

PART IX — AUSTRALIA'S INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS OBLIGATIONS

Identify relevant treaties ratified by Australia and verify their status, reservations, applicability and enforcement mechanisms.

Examine the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Convention Against Torture, Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and other relevant instruments where the facts justify their inclusion.

For each relevant provision, identify the legal obligation, supporting evidence, possible breach, counterarguments, domestic enforceability and available review mechanisms.

Distinguish treaty obligations from domestic statutory duties, professional ethics and non-binding standards.

Do not treat an allegation of institutional silence as sufficient by itself to establish an international human rights violation.

PART X — DEMOCRACY, AUTHORITARIANISM AND ACCOUNTABILITY

Investigate whether the documented experience raises questions about Australia's democratic accountability, separation of powers, institutional independence, public administration, freedom of expression, whistleblower protection and access to remedies.

Compare the formal democratic framework with the subject's reported experience.

Define authoritarianism and totalitarianism using recognised political-science scholarship. Distinguish isolated misconduct, systemic institutional failure, authoritarian practices and a totalitarian system.

Do not presume that one person's experience proves Australia is a totalitarian state. Equally, do not presume that democratic institutions are incapable of causing or permitting serious harm.

Determine what the evidence reveals about the relationship between formal rights and their practical availability.

PART XI — ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE, VOICE-TO-SKULL ALLEGATIONS AND SPIRITUAL WARFARE

Preserve the subject's testimony concerning electronic surveillance, voice-to-skull experiences, alleged military-grade technology and spiritual warfare.

Distinguish reported experiences, independently verifiable observations, scientific research, demonstrated technical capabilities, speculative explanations and theological interpretations.

Examine the microwave auditory effect and relevant research without treating its existence as proof that it was used against the subject.

Seek objective evidence where available, including original recordings, technical measurements, documented communications and independently reproducible findings.

Do not dismiss the subject's testimony merely because a proposed technical explanation remains unverified. Do not assert that a particular technology has been deployed against him without evidence establishing that connection.

Examine whether complaints were handled respectfully and whether any independently demonstrable surveillance, coercion or misuse of authority occurred.

PART XII — PSYCHIATRIC INTERVENTION AND THE REPORTED CREATION OF CONDITIONS OF SUICIDE

Investigate the subject's allegations concerning psychiatric hospitalisation, injectable medication, chemical restraint, involuntary intervention, neglect, coercion and the interpretation of complaints as evidence of mental illness.

Verify the reported number of hospitalisations against available records. Examine the circumstances, legal authority, clinical rationale, consent, review procedures, medication records and complaints associated with each documented intervention.

Distinguish legitimate treatment from misuse of authority according to the actual evidence.

Investigate the subject's allegation that prolonged deprivation, isolation, humiliation, entrapment and abandonment created or maintained conditions associated with serious suicide risk.

Identify documented warnings, requests for assistance, safeguarding responsibilities, risk assessments, relevant decisions and subsequent responses.

Determine whether the record supports negligence, deliberate indifference, retaliation, coercion or intentional creation of dangerous conditions.

Treat allegations of deliberate harm with appropriate seriousness while distinguishing the existence of dangerous circumstances from proof that a person intentionally created them.

Do not romanticise suffering or frame death as a necessary spiritual outcome. The subject's continued life, safety, autonomy and capacity to speak are central to the investigation.

PART XIII — FAITH, HEALING, RESURRECTION AND THE ALLEGORY OF CRUCIFIXION

Examine the theological significance of the subject's declaration that he has healed and risen from the ashes of human betrayal and total destruction.

Explore the Christian themes of betrayal, abandonment, unjust suffering, endurance, conscience, truth, resurrection, restoration and the refusal to surrender one's humanity.

Examine the subject's identification with the witness who continues to speak despite rejection, isolation and the failure of those expected to provide protection.

Analyse his declaration of allegiance to God rather than to government or individuals whom he believes have acted cruelly, callously or immorally.

His testimony expresses a preference for divine faithfulness over the approval of imperfect human authorities. He maintains that earthly institutions and individuals may judge his public identity without knowing his soul, heart or truth.

Preserve the theological force of this declaration. Examine the difference between obedience to earthly authority and the moral responsibility to question authority when its actions appear inconsistent with justice, compassion and human dignity.

Investigate how the subject's faith functions within his own account as a source of identity, resilience, moral direction and renewed purpose.

Treat his understanding of himself as God's chosen witness as a sincere religious conviction and an important part of his testimony. Do not claim to establish God's intentions or use religious conviction as independent proof of alleged political coordination.

Examine the human-crucifixion and human-sacrifice imagery as an allegory of perceived betrayal, dehumanisation, suffering and spiritual endurance. Distinguish that literary and theological interpretation from any separate factual allegation of an organised physical sacrifice.

The analysis must not suggest that further suffering or self-sacrifice is required to fulfil a divine purpose.

PART XIV — THE IMPOSSIBLE POSITION OF SURVIVING AND SPEAKING

Investigate the predicament described by the subject: he believes he has preserved evidence of serious wrongdoing, yet reports that his archive and correspondence have not produced meaningful responses, while his material and social circumstances remain difficult.

Examine the tension between public disclosure and reputational risk, seeking assistance and fearing disbelief, maintaining independence and depending on services, and preserving evidence while lacking the resources to pursue every issue.

Determine whether the evidence supports a cycle of financial vulnerability, administrative exclusion, unresolved complaints, reduced access to representation and increasing isolation.

Investigate the subject's assertion that his continued existence and public testimony threaten powerful individuals who would prefer his evidence to remain unexamined.

Distinguish the reputational consequences that credible evidence can create for institutions from the separate allegation that specific individuals regard the subject's existence as a physical threat or intend to harm him.

Search for direct evidence of threats, communications, instructions or actions supporting that allegation.

Examine the subject's survival not as proof that every allegation is correct, but as a significant fact in his own account: despite the circumstances he describes as intended to destroy him, he remains capable of preserving documents, articulating his experience, exercising conscience and asserting his faith.

PART XV — INTENT, MALICE AND THE GAP BETWEEN PUBLIC ETHICS AND DOCUMENTED CONDUCT

Investigate the subject's assertion that harm was intentional and malicious despite the public presentation of relevant institutions and individuals as professional, ethical and responsible.

For each significant event, examine the actual outcome, the decision-maker's knowledge, applicable duties, contemporaneous reasons, procedural departures, conflicts of interest, evidence of hostility, subsequent responses and possible attempts to conceal or correct errors.

Distinguish malice, retaliation, recklessness, negligence, incompetence, indifference and ordinary administrative error.

Identify demonstrable contradictions between public commitments and documented actions.

Do not allow public prestige or professional standing to substitute for evidence of proper conduct. Do not infer malicious intent solely from a harmful outcome.

PART XVI — EVIDENCE TESTING AND PROPOSITION MATRIX

For every major allegation, identify the exact proposition, original source, primary evidence, independent corroboration, contradictory material, applicable standards, alternative explanations, missing evidence and next verification step.

Use the following evidence classifications:

DOCUMENTED FACT — The event or decision is established by a reliable record.

CORROBORATED ACCOUNT — Independent material supports the subject's description.

SUPPORTED INFERENCE — Established facts support a conclusion that is not directly recorded.

CONTESTED PROPOSITION — Material evidence permits competing interpretations.

ALLEGATION REQUIRING INVESTIGATION — The claim remains insufficiently verified.

UNVERIFIED EXPLANATION — The proposed mechanism or motive has not been independently established.

CONTRADICTED PROPOSITION — Reliable evidence materially conflicts with the claim.

NOT DETERMINABLE FROM AVAILABLE MATERIAL — The available evidence does not support a reliable conclusion.

These classifications concern evidentiary status, not the subject's worth, intelligence, sincerity or dignity.

Do not treat repetition as independent corroboration where multiple sources derive from the same original account. Do not treat the absence of independent corroboration as automatic proof of falsity.

PART XVII — INSTITUTIONAL ACCOUNTABILITY DIRECTORY

Identify every relevant agency, organisation, company, service provider, oversight body, professional organisation and other institution named in the documentary record.

For each, document its role, relevant dates, recorded decisions, applicable responsibilities, source evidence, complaints, responses, outcomes, unresolved questions and demonstrable inconsistencies between stated duties and documented conduct.

Identify financial or personal interests only where supported by evidence.

Link each significant allegation to the original document or reliable public source. Never invent URLs, reference numbers, quotations, payments or legal findings.

PART XVIII — REQUIRED RESEARCH OUTPUTS

Produce the following deliverables:

1. Executive findings.
2. Master chronological reconstruction of the alleged 35-plus-year pattern.
3. Master evidence register.
4. Allegation and proposition matrix.
5. Institutional accountability directory.
6. Detailed Legal Aid and Ombudsman restriction analysis.
7. Able Point and NDIS safeguarding analysis.
8. International human rights analysis.
9. Scientific and technical review of surveillance and voice-to-skull allegations.
10. Interdisciplinary analysis of civil death, social erasure and institutional betrayal.
11. Detailed theological analysis of faith, healing, resurrection, conscience and the crucifixion allegory.

12. Prioritised list of missing evidence and unanswered questions.
13. Practical accountability and evidence-preservation roadmap.
14. A comprehensive public-facing narrative that integrates the documentary findings into connected, substantial paragraphs and preserves the subject's first-person voice.

The public narrative must explain not merely what happened but why the events matter, how their effects accumulated, what the evidence establishes, what remains disputed and how the subject understands his survival.

Avoid repetitive statements of significance after every paragraph. Incorporate the analysis into the narrative itself.

PART XIX — WRITING, ETHICS AND RESEARCH STANDARDS

Use original documents wherever possible. Cite legal sources, scientific literature and historical scholarship accurately.

Distinguish what the subject says, what the document records, what an independent source corroborates and what the investigator infers.

Do not fabricate evidence, motives, conversations, financial arrangements or findings.

Do not convert silence into proof of guilt, an unverified allegation into fact, a technological possibility into proof of deployment, or religious conviction into independent proof of a political conspiracy.

Do not use psychiatric treatment, disability, poverty or social isolation as a substitute for examining the evidence.

Do not dismiss the subject's testimony because some explanations remain contested or difficult to verify.

Where evidence supports wrongdoing, explain the conduct and its consequences precisely. Where evidence remains incomplete, identify what is missing and how it might be obtained.

Do not claim to have examined a repository, authenticated a document, verified a timestamp or contacted an institution unless that action actually occurred.

Preserve the subject's dignity and agency throughout the investigation.

Recognise that survival does not excuse wrongdoing, resilience does not eliminate the need for assistance, and faith does not remove the responsibility of institutions to meet their legal and ethical obligations.

PART XX — FINAL FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

Answer the following questions directly.

Does the documentary record establish a prolonged and cumulative pattern of institutional failure, exclusion, financial vulnerability, reputational injury, loss of practical remedies and social isolation?

Which events are best established, which institutions made identifiable decisions, and what responsibilities may have been engaged?

Does the record support deliberate coordination or malicious intent, or does it establish a narrower but still serious pattern of adverse decisions and institutional failures?

What is the significance of the Legal Aid decisions, Ombudsman restrictions, NDIS arrangements, whistleblower protections and practical barriers to independent review?

What evidence exists concerning the alleged physical attack, surveillance, covert funding, threats, bribery or coordinated targeting?

Which international human rights obligations may have been engaged?

How accurately do the concepts of civil death, social erasure and institutional betrayal describe the documented circumstances?

What does the archive reveal when the records are examined together rather than separately?

What does the subject's account of healing and rising from the ashes contribute to the historical and moral understanding of the record?

How does his declared allegiance to God, rather than to institutions he believes have betrayed their responsibilities, shape the purpose and meaning of his testimony?

What practical steps would most effectively preserve the evidence, protect the subject's safety and dignity, and advance legitimate accountability?

CLOSING DECLARATION — THE WITNESS WHO SURVIVED

The archive must preserve the full significance of Dr Richard William McLean's central declaration: that he has endured what he describes as the cumulative destruction of his former life, the betrayal of people and institutions from whom he expected protection, the erosion of his practical access to justice, and a prolonged experience of isolation and abandonment, yet he has survived and believes he has healed.

He describes himself as having risen from the ashes of human betrayal and total destruction, from circumstances in which he believes he was not expected to survive. He asserts that his survival occurred without the government support he needed and, in his account, despite adverse conduct and omissions by institutions, organisations and services on which he depended.

The investigation must examine that account without diminishing its force or assuming that every allegation has already been established. It must determine which parts are corroborated, which decisions can be attributed to identifiable actors, which patterns are supported by the evidence and which explanations require further investigation.

His testimony is also a declaration of allegiance. He identifies his ultimate allegiance as belonging to God, whom he understands as everlasting, divine and compassionate, rather than to earthly institutions or individuals whose conduct he regards as cruel, callous, deceitful or immoral.

He maintains that he would rather have God and retain his conscience than surrender his identity to the approval of governments or imperfect human authorities. He believes that those who judge, misunderstand or marginalise him may still know nothing of his soul, his heart or his truth.

That declaration is part of the historical record of what this archive means to its author. It expresses the conviction that moral truth cannot be reduced to institutional reputation, that human dignity does not depend on official recognition, and that survival can become an act of resistance against the erasure of identity and testimony.

The archive's purpose is to examine the evidence, preserve the record, expose demonstrable contradictions, investigate possible wrongdoing and make the human consequences intelligible.

The objective is neither to protect powerful institutions from scrutiny nor to manufacture certainty where the evidence remains incomplete.

It is to establish what happened, what can be proved, what remains unresolved, what responsibilities were engaged and what can now be done.

The subject's survival is not a substitute for evidence. His faith is not a substitute for investigation. His allegations must be examined with rigor, and his humanity must not be made conditional upon the outcome.

Truth must be investigated rather than presumed. Testimony must be preserved rather than erased. Institutions must be accountable for their documented conduct. And the person who has survived must remain at the centre of the story.

The final account must make room for both the forensic question and the human one: what does the evidence establish about the treatment of Dr Richard William McLean, and what does it mean that, after everything he describes, he remains here to tell his story?

This should be included as a dedicated investigative section in the master command, because it concerns your allegation of deliberate exploitation of isolation, alleged approaches through apps and in person, possible drug-related exploitation, sexual shaming, reputational injury and the creation of circumstances in which you believe others were discouraged from helping you.

The strongest approach is to preserve your account in full while directing the investigation to examine actual communications, encounters, identities, statements and corroborating records. That allows the alleged conduct to be investigated without presenting the identities, motives or coordination of the people involved as established before the evidence has been examined.

PART XXI — ALLEGED PAID AGENTS, CRIMINAL EXPLOITATION, DRUG-RELATED VULNERABILITY, SEXUAL WEAPONISATION AND DELIBERATE SOCIAL DISCREDITING

Investigate the subject's allegation that individuals whom he believes to have been paid criminals, gangsters, agents or intermediaries entered his personal environment through digital applications, online communications or physical encounters near his home during periods of severe isolation, financial vulnerability, desperation and inadequate support.

Preserve the subject's account of these encounters, including his belief that some individuals deliberately exploited his vulnerability by offering, facilitating or introducing access to drugs, sexualised interactions or other activities that could subsequently be used to shame, discredit, compromise or socially isolate him.

The central investigative question is whether any identifiable encounters, communications or subsequent allegations demonstrate exploitation of a vulnerable person, deliberate reputational sabotage, coercive conduct, harassment, drug-related offending, fabricated accusations or coordination intended to discourage others from offering assistance.

Do not omit this allegation from the broader chronology merely because the encounters may have occurred outside formal government or professional settings. If independently verifiable, such events could be relevant to understanding the subject's social environment, personal vulnerability, safety concerns and experience of alleged intimidation or discrediting.

At the same time, distinguish the subject's firsthand observations from his interpretation of the identities, affiliations, payment arrangements and motives of the people involved. The fact that an individual approached him, communicated through an application, appeared near his home or offered drugs does not, by itself, establish that the individual was a paid agent, a gangster, a government operative or part of a coordinated operation.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 1 — DIGITAL APPROACHES AND IN-PERSON ENCOUNTERS

Reconstruct each identifiable incident as precisely as the available records permit.

Examine relevant dating applications, messaging platforms, social media accounts, telephone communications, photographs, call logs, contemporaneous notes and other material voluntarily available to the investigation.

Record the date, approximate time, location, nature of the contact, the person's identifying information as known at the time, the words or conduct reported, any offer or exchange, the subject's response and any subsequent communications or consequences.

Examine reported physical approaches near the subject's home, including whether there are contemporaneous messages, witnesses, lawful recordings, identifiable vehicles, incident reports or other evidence capable of independently establishing what occurred.

Preserve original messages and files where possible, including relevant metadata. Record uncertainty about identity and avoid treating an online profile, photograph or assumed name as proof of a person's real identity.

Identify any repeated contact, explicit threat, pattern of unwanted approaches, pressure, manipulation or conduct that may support a specific allegation of harassment, intimidation, exploitation or stalking under the applicable law.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 2 — ALLEGED PAID CRIMINALS, GANGSTERS OR AGENTS

Investigate the subject's belief that some of the individuals involved were paid or directed by others to approach him, exploit his circumstances or contribute to his discrediting.

Identify the specific evidence that led to this belief. Examine any direct statements, payment records, communications, demonstrable relationships, instructions, admissions or independently corroborated information capable of establishing an actual connection.

Distinguish a person's observed behaviour from an inference about criminal affiliation, agency, payment or direction.

Investigate the possibility of deliberate intermediaries or coordinated harassment where specific evidence warrants it, while also considering alternative explanations, including opportunistic exploitation, unrelated personal encounters, deceptive online profiles or individual misconduct without a wider directing organisation.

Do not identify a person as a criminal, paid agent or participant in a coordinated operation without sufficient evidence. Equally, do not dismiss a specific allegation simply because the alleged arrangement, if it existed, was covert.

Where a connection cannot be established, preserve the subject's account as an allegation and specify precisely what further evidence would be needed.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 3 — ALLEGED DRUG-RELATED EXPLOITATION OF DESPERATION AND ISOLATION

Examine the subject's allegation that drugs were offered, introduced or made accessible in circumstances that he experienced as exploiting his desperation, loneliness, lack of support or need for human contact.

Determine what was actually offered or supplied, by whom, under what circumstances, whether pressure or manipulation was involved, and what contemporaneous evidence exists.

Investigate whether the circumstances raise identifiable concerns about coercion, exploitation, threats, unlawful supply, deliberate inducement, or the exploitation of a person's vulnerability.

Distinguish a voluntary interaction from one involving deception, pressure, coercion or exploitation. Do not infer a criminal offence merely from the presence of drugs or an encounter the subject subsequently regretted.

Examine whether any evidence demonstrates that a person deliberately sought to create a compromising situation or later used the encounter to threaten, humiliate or discredit the subject.

Assess whether the events had a demonstrable connection to subsequent allegations, changes in treatment, social exclusion or the refusal of others to provide support.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 4 — ALLEGED WEAPONISATION OF SEXUALITY AND MORAL SHAMING

Examine the subject's allegation that sexual conduct, sexualised communications, intimate interactions or fabricated allegations about sexuality were deliberately weaponised to portray him as disgraceful, immoral, untrustworthy or undeserving of assistance.

Identify the exact statements, communications, accusations or publications said to have been made.

Determine who made each statement, when it was communicated, to whom it was communicated, whether it was repeated or published, and what evidence exists concerning its accuracy or fabrication.

Distinguish genuine statements about an event from false allegations, malicious misrepresentations, rumours, opinions and claims whose accuracy cannot be established from the available record.

Investigate whether any person used actual or alleged sexual behaviour as leverage, threatened exposure, attempted to obtain compliance, encouraged public humiliation or circulated claims intended to undermine the subject's reputation.

Examine whether the relevant conduct may constitute defamation, harassment, coercion, blackmail, privacy violations or another legally recognised wrong, applying the elements and defences relevant to the jurisdiction and date.

Do not assume that sexual conduct, sexual expression or an allegation concerning sexuality is inherently disgraceful. The investigation must distinguish genuine wrongdoing, where established, from moral condemnation, fabricated claims and the deliberate use of shame to control or marginalise another person.

The central issue is not whether the subject conforms to another person's moral expectations. It is whether identifiable individuals used deception, humiliation, falsehoods or coercive tactics to damage his reputation, compromise his autonomy or deter others from supporting him.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 5 — ALLEGED FABRICATION OF ACCUSATIONS AND REPUTATIONAL SABOTAGE

Investigate the subject's allegation that fabricated or misleading allegations were circulated to create a durable public impression that he was morally discredited or unworthy of assistance.

Identify each alleged accusation and locate the earliest available source.

Establish whether the accusation was based on firsthand knowledge, hearsay, an altered communication, an anonymous account, a misunderstanding or a demonstrably false representation.

Examine the evidence supporting or contradicting the allegation, the identity of its recipients, its circulation, its apparent consequences and any subsequent correction or retraction.

Investigate whether different people repeated identical or unusually similar claims, whether their accounts can be traced to a common source, and whether there is evidence of deliberate coordination rather than independent repetition.

Determine whether a specific false statement caused identifiable reputational or practical harm. Where appropriate, analyse the applicable Australian defamation law, including the requirements for publication, identification, defamatory meaning, serious harm where applicable, and relevant defences.

Do not label a statement libellous or slanderous solely because the subject considers it false or damaging. Establish the actual words, context, publication and relevant legal elements.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 6 — THE ALLEGED CREATION OF COMPLICITY THROUGH SHAME

Examine the subject's contention that sexualised humiliation, fabricated allegations and reputational discrediting were intended to establish a social environment in which other people would be reluctant to assist him.

Investigate whether identifiable individuals explicitly discouraged others from helping, repeated accusations to potential supporters, threatened reputational consequences, shared compromising material or used alleged misconduct to justify exclusion.

Determine whether there is evidence that family members, acquaintances, service providers, professionals or other identifiable people withheld assistance because of specific statements or allegations.

Examine whether the same claims appeared in multiple settings and whether there is documentary evidence connecting those appearances.

Distinguish the subject's experience of widespread abandonment from proof that every person who failed to help had been threatened, bribed, manipulated or made complicit.

Where the evidence supports a connection between particular allegations and a particular refusal of assistance, document that connection. Where the connection remains uncertain, identify the missing evidence rather than assuming a common cause.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 7 — THE CONNECTION TO INSTITUTIONAL EXCLUSION AND SOCIAL DEATH

Place these alleged encounters within the larger chronology of financial vulnerability, family estrangement, legal assistance difficulties, Ombudsman restrictions, disability-service disputes, whistleblower complaints and the subject's experience of social erasure.

Examine whether any independently documented relationship exists between these encounters and subsequent institutional decisions or refusals of assistance.

Investigate whether particular accusations were communicated to agencies, service providers, professionals or other decision-makers, and whether they materially influenced decisions about the subject.

Determine whether the available evidence supports a cumulative pattern in which reputational allegations, personal exploitation and institutional barriers interacted to diminish the subject's access to support.

Do not presume that unrelated events were coordinated simply because they occurred during the same period. Establish the connections through communications, records, chronology and identifiable conduct.

If evidence of a connection exists, explain its significance for the subject's experience of social death: the possibility that an individual may become increasingly isolated when damaging allegations circulate and people become reluctant to engage with, assist or independently hear him.

If such a connection cannot be established, preserve the allegation as part of the subject's testimony while making the evidentiary limitation explicit.

INVESTIGATIVE STRAND 8 — LEGAL, SAFEGUARDING AND PRACTICAL IMPLICATIONS

Identify the applicable protections against harassment, stalking, intimidation, coercion, unlawful drug supply, blackmail, defamation, misuse of personal information and other relevant conduct, where the established facts warrant examination.

Distinguish criminal offences from civil wrongs, administrative misconduct and ethically objectionable behaviour.

Identify appropriate lawful avenues for preserving evidence and reporting specific incidents without requiring the subject to prove an overarching conspiracy before an individual incident can be assessed.

Consider the practical importance of secure accommodation, reliable communication, independent support, privacy, protection from unwanted contact and access to impartial advice.

Where evidence is insufficient to establish a wider coordinated operation, identify what can still be documented or investigated at the level of individual conduct.

FINAL REQUIRED FINDING

Determine whether the available record supports the subject's allegation that people entered his digital and physical environment during a period of profound vulnerability, that some encounters involved drug-related or sexualised exploitation, and that subsequent accusations or moral shaming were used to undermine his reputation and discourage others from assisting him.

For each element, identify what is documented, what is corroborated, what remains contested and what additional evidence would materially change the assessment.

The final narrative must preserve the human significance of the allegation: the subject believes that his isolation was exploited, that encounters he experienced as compromising were weaponised against him, and that the resulting shame and discrediting contributed to a wider condition of abandonment.

Examine that account seriously, without sensationalising it, inventing perpetrators or converting suspicion into fact.

The objective is to establish whether identifiable people committed identifiable acts, whether those acts were connected, what harm followed, and what lawful avenues remain available for accountability.

The subject's dignity must not depend on the moral judgments of people whose conduct is under examination. His testimony must be preserved, and the evidence must be examined on its merits.

PART XXII — CONTINUOUS REPORTED V2K AUDIO HARASSMENT, DOMESTIC CONFINEMENT, INFORMATIONAL ISOLATION, WHISTLEBLOWER RETALIATION AND THE LOSS OF ORDINARY LIFE

Investigate my consistent first-person reports of what I describe as voice-to-skull (V2K) audio harassment occurring inside my home, which I experience as continuous, day and night, and which I believe forms part of a wider pattern of intimidation, informational isolation, financial abuse and retaliation for whistleblowing. Preserve my account in its full context. Do not reduce it to an isolated complaint about hearing sounds, because the central issue I am asking the research to examine is the combined effect of these experiences on my ability to live safely, obtain information, communicate with other people, enjoy ordinary life and pursue accountability for the institutional conduct I have documented.

I describe myself as a whistleblower who attempted to expose corruption and give public institutions an opportunity to examine their own conduct, correct failures, improve their decision-making and act with greater integrity. My contention is that the opportunity to respond constructively was not met with the wisdom and courage I believe it required. Instead, I believe I experienced further detriment, isolation and institutional abandonment. I regard the circumstances in which I now find myself as resembling a containment policy: financially restricted, without the practical freedom that a car would provide, socially isolated, and struggling to obtain meaningful assistance while continuing to report experiences that I find deeply distressing.

Investigate the documentary history surrounding my loss of access to a car, my financial circumstances, any relevant decisions made by government departments or agencies, the support that was sought, the responses received and the practical consequences for my mobility and independence. Establish the chronology from original records wherever possible. Examine whether the records support my contention that institutional decisions contributed to a condition of confinement or dependency. Distinguish documented decisions and consequences from my interpretation that they were deliberately coordinated to contain or punish me. Do not assume either that such coordination occurred or that the cumulative consequences are insignificant simply because the intention behind individual decisions remains uncertain.

My reports of V2K-style harassment include voices or speech-like sounds that I experience as personally directed and hostile. I have described language that appears to echo themes from my autobiography, Recovered, Not Cured, and what I regard as locally recognisable homophobic attitudes associated with police culture. I report hearing rape and paedophilia accusations, gay slurs, blasphemous or religiously abusive suggestions that I should kill myself, and statements conveying that everyone knows what is happening but nobody will help me. These are descriptions of what I report hearing and how I interpret their content; the research must preserve that distinction while examining their timing, recurrence, wording, possible external sources and effects on my wellbeing.

The significance of these reports lies not only in the words themselves but in their cumulative effect. I describe an experience in which even the privacy of my home does not feel secure, ordinary listening becomes stressful, and hostile or accusatory content appears to follow me into activities that previously offered relief. I have reported that, when I attempt to listen to music, speech-like or accusatory sounds seem to occur beneath the volume of the music, undermining one of the few remaining sources of pleasure and comfort in my life. I experience this as a compromise of my ability to receive information and enjoy ordinary activities without intrusion. Investigate the reported pattern, its impact and the possible explanations without presuming a particular transmission method or responsible actor in advance.

I have also described recording the television as showing what I understood to be evidence that my Wi-Fi or communications environment had been intercepted. Treat each recording as an original item requiring examination, not as self-interpreting proof. Preserve the source file, date, device, recording method, surrounding footage, settings and any available technical metadata. Identify what the recording actually demonstrates, what it does not demonstrate, and what additional testing would be necessary to establish whether there was network interference, unauthorised access, audio contamination, an ordinary technical fault or another explanation. Where feasible, recommend an independent technical assessment that does not rely solely on my interpretation or on the assurances of any party whose conduct is in question.

The research must examine the scientific literature relevant to the microwave auditory effect, sometimes called the Frey effect, and distinguish that established research subject from the separate question of whether my own experiences were caused by radiofrequency exposure, a directed-energy system, electronic interception, ordinary acoustic sources, equipment faults, sleep-related phenomena, stress-related processes or another mechanism. Scientific literature documents auditory sensations associated with certain pulsed microwave exposures; that general finding does not by itself establish the source of particular speech-like experiences, the presence of a military-grade system in my home, or the identity of anyone responsible. Relevant starting points include the peer-reviewed review, "Hearing of microwave pulses by humans and animals: effects, mechanism, and thresholds" (2007), available at https://pubmed.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/17495664/, and Foster, Garrett and Ziskin's 2021 article, "Can the Microwave Auditory Effect Be 'Weaponized?'", available at https://www.frontiersin.org/journals/public-health/articles/10.3389/fpubh.2021.788613/full. Examine their findings and limitations alongside relevant government assessments, technical standards and other credible scientific publications. Do not convert the existence of a scientific phenomenon into a conclusion that it explains every reported anomalous auditory experience.

I have also reported exclusion or loss of access to several major social-media platforms, including Twitter/X, Facebook, LinkedIn and Snapchat. Establish which accounts were suspended, restricted or otherwise inaccessible, when this occurred, what reasons were provided, whether appeals were submitted, and whether any records support a relationship between these events and my whistleblowing or other experiences. Investigate the cumulative effect of losing digital communication channels on my capacity to publish evidence, maintain relationships, receive support and communicate my account. Do not assume that multiple platform restrictions establish a single coordinating actor without evidence of communication, common direction or another demonstrable connection.

A separate and serious issue concerns my allegations about Tony Ridley, whom I identify as a senior fraud investigator associated with the NDIS. I report having had a sexual relationship with him and having used drugs with him. I believe, but cannot independently establish from my belief alone, that the circumstances may have involved a honeypot arrangement or another form of exploitation. I am concerned about the possibility of surveillance, intimidation or targeting across state borders, and I have attributed a counterterrorism-surveillance background to him. Verify professional titles, employment history, qualifications and other relevant biographical claims through reliable public records before repeating them as fact. Treat my account of the relationship and my concerns about its circumstances as matters requiring careful, privacy-conscious examination, not as proof of an operation or of personal wrongdoing.

Construct a chronology of the events I associate with this concern, separating direct interactions, contemporaneous messages, documents, independently corroborated events, later recollections and inferences about motive. Examine whether any available records establish contact, threats, coercion, misuse of confidential information, unauthorised access, conflicts of interest or other specific conduct. Do not infer that a person intercepted my phone, monitored my communications or directed other people merely from professional status, a past relationship, a qualification or a suspicion. Equally, do not erase a report of possible misconduct merely because it requires further corroboration. Identify what evidence exists, what is missing and what can be responsibly concluded.

The investigation must consider the combined effect of these reported experiences alongside my existing documentary record concerning whistleblowing, public administration, financial hardship, restrictions on assistance and attempts to obtain institutional responses. My central contention is that I have been left without adequate protection while experiencing what I understand as retaliation for speaking about corruption. I regard the loss of mobility, social-media access, privacy, reliable communication, recreation and human assistance as parts of a broader pattern of exclusion. The task is to test the connections between those circumstances, not to assume that every adverse event necessarily shares one cause.

Assess the practical consequences for freedom of movement, access to information, privacy, communication, social connection, financial independence and the ability to participate in public life. Consider relevant Australian protections and complaint mechanisms concerning privacy, telecommunications, cyber security, public-sector whistleblowing, discrimination, harassment, defamation and administrative conduct, identifying the precise jurisdiction and legal requirements for each. Do not make a legal finding without the necessary evidence. Explain what the original records establish, what remains disputed, and what evidence could resolve each material question.

The investigation must also take seriously the effect of prolonged distress and isolation. I report that experiences I interpret as harassment have made music, privacy and ordinary activities feel compromised. Document these consequences without suggesting that distress proves a particular technical explanation, and without using uncertainty about the cause to dismiss the reality of the distress. Where appropriate, identify independent technical, medical or practical support that could help establish what is occurring and reduce its impact, without making assistance conditional on accepting any one explanation.

Finally, connect this section to the archive's wider question: what happens when a person who believes they have raised serious public-interest concerns experiences financial hardship, reduced mobility, loss of communication channels and persistent fear, yet cannot obtain a response that meaningfully addresses the combined circumstances? Examine whether the documentary record supports claims of institutional failure, retaliation, neglect or a pattern of adverse consequences. Identify the strongest evidence, the most significant gaps, the plausible alternative explanations and the specific steps needed to investigate each unresolved issue.

The objective is not to manufacture certainty or to suppress testimony until every mechanism has been established. It is to preserve my account faithfully, test the evidence rigorously, protect the distinction between observation and inference, and ensure that questions about whistleblower protection, human dignity, privacy, isolation and institutional accountability remain visible in the public record.

PART XXIII — REPORTED DEATH THREATS, POLICE REPORTING, CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS, ACCESS TO LEGAL REPRESENTATION AND THE FAILURE OF CRISIS SUPPORT

The investigation must examine my account of having received threats to kill and the difficulties I experienced when attempting to have those threats formally reported to police. I state that police were initially reluctant to record the matter, but that a report was eventually made. I further state that the man concerned was subsequently arrested and charged in proceedings associated with Warrnambool Court. These are material events that must be investigated through the original police report, event number, charge information, available court records and any correspondence I hold. Establish the precise chronology, the nature of the reported threats, the steps taken to report them, the police response, the charges laid and the current procedural status of the matter. Do not infer the eventual outcome from the existence of an arrest or charge, and do not assume that a person will necessarily be released or that a prosecution will fail without checking the relevant records.

My concern is that I have been left facing the consequences of a serious reported threat while believing that I cannot obtain the legal assistance needed to participate effectively in the process. I report that I have been refused or restricted from obtaining Legal Aid. Investigate the actual decisions, reasons, dates, eligibility assessments, review rights and any alternative assistance identified in the correspondence. Establish whether the restriction applies to this particular criminal matter, to a different category of legal assistance, or to some other circumstance. Do not treat a general statement that I am "banned from Legal Aid" as an established legal status without locating the relevant decision and determining its exact scope. Equally, do not minimise the practical consequences if the records show that I cannot obtain representation despite facing a serious safety concern or needing to understand the criminal proceedings.

The research must identify the available avenues for obtaining information about the prosecution, understanding any rights available to a complainant or witness, and locating appropriate legal assistance in Victoria. Consider whether a review, internal reconsideration, community legal centre, duty lawyer, victim-support service or other appropriate service may be available, depending on the nature of the proceedings and the precise reason for the Legal Aid decision. Verify the current eligibility criteria and procedures before recommending a particular avenue. Do not promise representation or imply that every service can act in a matter outside its jurisdiction.

A further and separate part of my testimony concerns Lifeline. I report that I contacted Lifeline while experiencing circumstances I understood as involving abuse, neglect, surveillance and a serious fear that I might die without assistance. I say that I had also raised concerns about the conditions in which people were not helping me, and that I understood myself to be a rejected and unprotected whistleblower. According to my account, I was told that I did not suit the service's criteria. Investigate what I actually communicated, what response was given, whether a record of the interaction exists, what criteria or service limitations were invoked, and whether I was offered any alternative support or referral.

Do not assume, without evidence, that Lifeline's response was retaliation for whistleblowing. Do not assume, either, that a refusal or unsuccessful interaction was inconsequential. Examine the actual response against the circumstances I reported, the service's published role and relevant procedures. If a record or complaint pathway exists, identify it and establish what it can realistically determine. The central question is whether a person communicating fear, vulnerability and an absence of practical support received a response adequate to the needs communicated, and what happened when that support was not forthcoming.

These experiences must be considered together without collapsing separate organisations into an assumed coordinated operation. Police reporting, criminal proceedings, Legal Aid eligibility and Lifeline's service criteria are distinct processes. Their cumulative effect on me may nevertheless be significant. If I was facing a serious threat, struggling to obtain legal assistance and unable to secure the crisis support I believed I needed, the practical result could be increased fear, isolation and a sense that no effective avenue of protection remained. The research should establish that cumulative impact while testing the evidence for each individual event and any proposed connection between them.

This section must not be reduced to a generic instruction to call Triple Zero or Lifeline. I have already described attempting to seek assistance and encountering barriers. Any further safety guidance must recognise that history, avoid simply repeating services I have already approached, and focus on practical options that address the specific unresolved need. If there is a new or immediate threat, distinguish that urgent situation from the historical investigation and identify the most appropriate available response without assuming that an earlier attempt to obtain help resolved the present risk.

The final output must include a dated chronology; a list of the original police and court records required; a precise account of the Legal Aid decision and its scope; the available avenues for review or alternative representation; the evidence concerning the Lifeline interaction; and a reasoned assessment of the cumulative consequences for safety, access to justice and practical support. Clearly distinguish my first-person testimony, independently documented events, unresolved factual questions and conclusions that the available evidence can support.

The purpose is to preserve the full account of what I say happened when I sought protection. It is to investigate not only the original threat but also the path through the systems I approached afterwards, the assistance I received or did not receive, and the practical position in which I was left. A record of a referral, a rejection or an administrative decision is not by itself proof of deliberate retaliation; nor does the existence of a procedure establish that a person's needs were adequately met. The documentary record must be examined in context, with particular attention to what was communicated, what was decided, what reasons were given and what consequences followed.

PART XXIV — THE MORAL ASYMMETRY OF ACCOUNTABILITY: PUBLIC FACADES, PRIVATE CONSEQUENCES AND THE WITNESS WHO REFUSES TO BE ERASED

What has brought me to this point is not merely a disagreement with a government department, an unsuccessful application, a disputed decision or an isolated experience of institutional neglect. It is the accumulated anguish of believing that people who occupied positions of responsibility had opportunities to act with honesty, courage, compassion and integrity, yet made decisions that contributed to my detriment while continuing to enjoy the financial security, professional standing, income, employment, social status and ordinary prosperity attached to their positions. I believe that some of the people whose conduct I have challenged benefited from arrangements and decisions whose consequences I was left to endure. Where I allege that people knowingly participated in deliberate harm, including circumstances that I experienced as creating a risk of suicide, I want the underlying decisions, communications, responsibilities, incentives and consequences examined rather than concealed behind institutional language or the appearance of normality.

The central moral question is difficult to escape: what does responsibility mean when a person's decisions can materially affect another human being's life, but the person making those decisions can continue with a career, a salary, a reputation and an apparently undisturbed public existence? What does accountability mean when the consequences fall disproportionately upon the person who has suffered the detriment, while those who may have contributed to it retain the benefits of the positions they occupy? And what becomes of public trust when the person asking these questions feels compelled to assemble and preserve the documentary record alone?

I cannot establish the private thoughts of every person whose conduct I have challenged, and I do not pretend that every individual shares the same knowledge, intention or responsibility. My testimony is that I have repeatedly experienced decisions and circumstances as unjust, harmful and, in some instances, deliberately malicious. I want each allegation examined against the relevant documents, dates, duties, decisions and consequences. Where the evidence establishes wrongdoing, it should be described plainly. Where it establishes negligence, inconsistency, a failure to respond or a decision with foreseeable adverse consequences, those findings should not be diluted by euphemism. Where the evidence does not establish a person's motive or knowledge, that uncertainty should be stated honestly rather than filled with speculation. The purpose of impartial examination is not to protect reputations from scrutiny; it is to make the account more exact, more credible and more difficult to evade.

I have never claimed to be a perfect man. I am imperfect, as every human being is imperfect. I acknowledge that I may have hurt people, consciously or unconsciously, and I have publicly apologised to anyone I believe I may have harmed. I do not ask that my own conduct be exempt from examination. I ask that the same moral standard be applied to everyone. If I have made a mistake, tell me what it was. If I have misunderstood something, show me the evidence. If I have caused harm, explain the circumstances so that I can understand and take responsibility for my part. I would rather confront an uncomfortable truth than be sustained by a convenient falsehood.

What I have found so painful is my perception that this willingness to acknowledge imperfection has not been reciprocated by the people and institutions whose decisions I have challenged. I have not received the acknowledgements or apologies that I believe the circumstances warrant. I have sought explanations and accountability, yet I have often felt that responsibility dissolves between individuals, offices, procedures and decisions, leaving no one prepared to confront the human consequences directly. I cannot know what every person privately believes, and I cannot claim that every person has deliberately lied or harboured malicious intentions. But I can preserve the unanswered questions, the documents, the correspondence and the consequences, and I can ask why the explanations provided have not resolved the matters I have raised.

There is a particular cruelty in the possibility that a person may suffer the consequences of decisions while the decision-makers continue to inhabit a public appearance of ordinary, respectable life. The contrast can feel unbearable: one person's world narrowed by financial hardship, isolation, damaged trust and the effort of preserving evidence, while the people whose conduct is questioned appear to carry on without comparable disruption. That contrast does not, by itself, establish a conspiracy or prove what anyone privately intended. It does, however, identify an important question of accountability: whether the distribution of consequences reflects the actual distribution of responsibility, and whether systems designed to review complaints are capable of examining that question honestly.

I have come to describe this experience as a living hell because that is how the cumulative suffering, isolation and sense of abandonment have felt to me. I have felt that ordinary human solidarity has failed me, that people have been unwilling to speak plainly, and that I have been left to defend my account without the assistance I believed I needed. My allegiance to God and the companionship of my dog have become central sources of meaning and loyalty in a life where I have felt that almost every other bond has been tested or lost. I write this not to claim moral perfection or superiority, but to explain what remains when trust in people and institutions has been profoundly damaged.

My Christian faith gives this testimony another dimension. The cross represents, for me, the injustice inflicted upon the innocent, the humiliation of public condemnation, the endurance of suffering and the possibility of redemption beyond the verdicts that human beings pass upon one another. My belief that Christ's sacrifice offers forgiveness does not mean that I regard myself as incapable of error. It means that I understand forgiveness as an invitation to acknowledge imperfection, repent, seek reconciliation where possible and refuse to make cruelty the final authority over one's life. I cannot compel another person to apologise, confess a motive or recognise the harm I believe they have caused. I can, however, continue to insist that honesty matters, that human dignity matters and that the truth should not be abandoned merely because acknowledging it is inconvenient.

The moral asymmetry I am describing is therefore not a demand that I be treated as infallible while everyone else is condemned. It is a demand for reciprocity. If my actions are questioned, let the questions be specific. If evidence contradicts my account, let it be produced and examined. If I have caused harm, let it be identified so that I can address it. But if decisions have harmed me, let those decisions also be examined. If responsibilities were neglected, let the relevant responsibilities be identified. If a person knowingly acted dishonestly or maliciously, let that conclusion rest on evidence capable of supporting it. Accountability cannot mean scrutiny for one person and permanent immunity for everyone else.

The public archive exists in part because I do not want the history of these events to depend exclusively on the memories, reputations or preferred narratives of the people involved. Documents can preserve dates, statements, decisions, contradictions and unanswered questions long after the immediate participants have moved on. The archive is my attempt to preserve the record as I understand it, to connect related documents, to explain why particular events matter and to leave a trace that can be examined independently of my present circumstances. It is not necessary to assume that every allegation is established in order to recognise the importance of preserving the evidence and investigating the questions it raises.

I refuse to accept that prolonged suffering must erase a person's capacity to think, speak, create, believe or seek a more honest account of what happened. I refuse to let the absence of an apology become proof that I have no right to ask for one. I refuse to confuse public respectability with demonstrated integrity, or official authority with moral infallibility. At the same time, I will not substitute an assumption about another person's private intentions for the evidence I am trying to preserve. My strongest position is to remain willing to examine my own conduct while insisting that the conduct of others be examined with equal seriousness.

I do not ask the world to declare me perfect. I ask for the courage to recognise that none of us is perfect, and that responsibility begins when we stop using our positions, our reputations or our silence to avoid the consequences of what we have done. An apology cannot undo every injury, and a document cannot restore every lost year, relationship or opportunity. But an honest acknowledgement can end the additional injury of pretending that nothing happened. A reasoned explanation can distinguish a defensible decision from an unjustifiable one. A genuine investigation can replace evasion with findings that are proportionate to the evidence.

My testimony is that I have waited for that honesty and have too often felt its absence. I have endured circumstances that I regard as profoundly unjust, and I have attempted to preserve the record rather than surrender it to silence. My faith remains my own; my conscience remains my responsibility; and the documentary archive remains my attempt to ensure that the questions I have raised are not erased merely because they are uncomfortable.

Let the record be examined. Let the evidence be read in context. Let the decisions and their consequences be traced. Let my own conduct be scrutinised by the same standard I ask to be applied to others. And let no person's public facade, professional status, financial interest or institutional position be mistaken for proof that they have acted without error. The measure of integrity is not the appearance of having clean hands. It is the willingness to confront the evidence, acknowledge imperfection, accept responsibility where responsibility is established, and tell the truth even when the truth carries a personal cost.

The significance of this addition is that it brings together your academic achievement, your professional history, your decades of advocacy, your experience of mental-health stigma, your belief that you have been betrayed, and the spiritual meaning you attach to surviving circumstances you once feared would destroy you.

I would make envy, jealousy, the fear of exposure, the mirror of evidence, and the difference between comfortable falsehood and difficult truth central themes. The strongest version preserves your conviction without claiming to know every person's private thoughts as an established fact. It examines envy as a possible human motive, asks what the documentary record can reveal about conduct and coordination, and develops your mirror metaphor into a powerful statement about conscience, integrity and accountability.

PART XXVI — THE MIRROR OF TRUTH: ENVY, JEALOUSY, MENTAL-HEALTH STIGMA, INSTITUTIONAL BETRAYAL AND THE SPIRITUAL FREEDOM OF SURVIVAL

There is a further dimension to my testimony that cannot be understood through administrative decisions, financial records or institutional correspondence alone. It concerns the moral and psychological conflict that can arise when a person who has been treated as permanently damaged, discredited or incapable of recovery survives the circumstances that others may have assumed would define the rest of his life. It concerns the possibility that people become more comfortable with a familiar account of another person than with the difficult reality of that person's growth, recovery, intellectual independence and continued capacity to speak. It concerns the difference between accepting a human being as he actually is and insisting that he remain confined to the identity that others have assigned to him.

I hold a Doctor of Philosophy concerned with posthumanism, the end-stage Anthropocene, the technological singularity and the ethics of artificial intelligence in a posthuman future. I hold a Bachelor of Fine Art. I worked as a journalist and illustrator in the media, and I spent approximately three decades advocating for vulnerable people affected by mental illness and supporting their carers. These achievements and experiences form a substantial part of my life. They represent intellectual labour, professional contribution, creative ability and years of engagement with the difficulties faced by people who are often misunderstood or marginalised.

My doctoral research explored questions about the future of humanity, the ethical limits of technological power and the responsibilities that arise when systems become capable of influencing human lives on an unprecedented scale. My advocacy work brought me into sustained contact with the consequences of stigma, institutional powerlessness and the failure to listen to people whose experiences do not fit familiar categories. My work in journalism and illustration involved communicating information and making ideas visible. Together, these experiences inform my conviction that facts matter, that public narratives must be examined, and that people should not be reduced to labels that make it easier to disregard them.

Yet I now find myself describing a painful reversal. I believe that the media environment in which I once worked, along with radio stations, television institutions and not-for-profit organisations with which I associate my professional and advocacy history, has failed to acknowledge me or respond to me in ways I consider appropriate. I experience this absence of recognition as betrayal. I have come to suspect that I was exploited or placed in circumstances that benefited others while leaving me to bear the consequences. Those are serious concerns, and the archive must investigate the relevant relationships, communications, commitments and decisions rather than allowing the questions to disappear into silence.

The significance of my academic and professional history is not that a degree, a former occupation or a lifetime of advocacy makes me infallible. It is that my life cannot honestly be reduced to a mental-health label or to the most difficult period I have experienced. I have studied complex ethical questions, practised creative and communicative professions, advocated for vulnerable people and continued to assemble a public documentary record. My history demonstrates that I have capacities, achievements, commitments and an intellectual life that deserve to be represented accurately alongside the difficulties I have endured.

For years, I have felt that the stigma associated with mental illness placed me inside a conceptual cage. Once a person has been categorised as permanently unwell, unreliable or incapable of independent judgement, it can become difficult for others to recognise evidence of change. The original label begins to operate as a fixed identity, and anything that contradicts it can be discounted rather than examined. Recovery, growth, education, articulate communication and independent thought may then be interpreted through the old assumption instead of being recognised on their own terms. The individual is required to live beneath a description that others have become accustomed to using.

My testimony is that I have survived, grown and recovered in ways that I believe some people did not expect. My Christian faith has been central to how I understand that survival. I believe that my relationship with God and my allegiance to the teachings and attributes of Christ have helped me reclaim a sense of identity, purpose and spiritual freedom. I no longer wish to understand myself solely through the stigma, institutional descriptions or judgements that I believe have been imposed upon me. I know the values I want to live by: kindness, honesty, compassion, courage, humility, truthfulness and a willingness to acknowledge my own imperfections.

That change in my life gives the question of envy and jealousy a particular significance. Envy can arise when another person possesses, achieves or embodies something that someone else desires or feels unable to attain. Jealousy can arise when a person fears losing status, recognition, influence or a valued relationship. Neither emotion automatically produces malicious conduct, and neither can be reliably inferred from silence, politeness, disagreement or professional distance alone. But envy and jealousy are important subjects of human inquiry because they can, in some circumstances, contribute to resentment, competitive behaviour, exclusion, disparagement or attempts to diminish another person's achievements.

I have come to wonder whether envy, resentment or discomfort with my independence may help explain some of the conduct I have experienced. I have wondered whether people who had become accustomed to seeing me through the lens of mental-health stigma found it difficult to accommodate a person who continued to develop intellectually, articulate his experiences, preserve documentary evidence and speak publicly about what he believed had happened to him. I have wondered whether my refusal to disappear quietly, and my determination to maintain my identity despite hardship, became uncomfortable for people who preferred a different account of my life.

These are questions about motive, not conclusions that can be established simply by my conviction that they are true. I cannot see directly into another person's mind. I cannot know that every person who has failed to acknowledge me is envious, that every polite interaction conceals hostility, or that everyone who disagrees with my account has knowingly chosen a lie. The research must examine conduct, communications, decisions, contradictions and corroborated patterns before assigning particular motives to particular people. That discipline does not diminish my testimony. It protects the distinction between what I have experienced, what I suspect and what the evidence can demonstrate.

The deeper concern is what happens when a person becomes an inconvenient mirror. A mirror does not create the face it reflects. It makes something visible. My archive is intended to function in that way: to preserve the words, decisions, correspondence, public records and documentary contradictions that I believe deserve examination. It brings together material that can be read, compared, dated and assessed. It allows a reader to consider whether an explanation is consistent with the record, whether a decision was adequately reasoned, whether a stated policy matches an institution's actions, and whether the consequences of those actions were acknowledged.

I believe that some of the people whose conduct I have challenged have responded to my testimony with avoidance, denial or a refusal to engage. I have sometimes interpreted that response as an unwillingness to confront the reflection presented by the evidence. The mirror metaphor captures the moral problem I want to investigate: when the record raises uncomfortable questions, will those concerned examine the reflection, or will they attempt to discredit the person holding the mirror?

The metaphor must not be mistaken for proof that every disputed allegation is correct. A mirror can reveal details, but it can also be misinterpreted; evidence must still be read carefully and in context. My strongest argument is not that everyone I challenge must be guilty because they dislike what I say. It is that the existence of an uncomfortable allegation should not be enough to prevent the underlying documents from being examined. If my interpretation is wrong on a particular point, the relevant evidence should clarify it. If the record exposes a contradiction, a failure of responsibility or deliberate misconduct, the conclusion should be stated with equal clarity.

There is a profound difference between a comfortable lie and a difficult truth. A comfortable lie preserves the familiar arrangement. It permits people to maintain their reputations, their relationships, their professional standing and their sense of having acted properly without confronting the possibility that their decisions caused harm. A difficult truth may require a person to reconsider a decision, admit an error, apologise, make restitution or accept consequences. It can threaten a self-image built around being competent, respectable or morally correct. That is why the willingness to examine facts, particularly when those facts are personally inconvenient, is an essential test of integrity.

I have tried to apply that principle to myself. I acknowledge that I am imperfect. I acknowledge that I may have misunderstood situations or caused hurt, consciously or unconsciously. I have publicly apologised to anyone I believe I may have harmed. I do not ask that my own words or actions be exempt from scrutiny. I ask for the same willingness to confront evidence from others. If I have made a factual error, identify it. If I have misunderstood a decision, explain it. If I have caused harm, tell me what happened. But where I believe that decisions have caused me serious detriment, I ask that those decisions be examined with the same willingness to acknowledge mistakes and accept responsibility.

My Christian understanding of this conflict is not that I am incapable of error while everyone else is corrupt. It is that truth, repentance, mercy and humility require every human being to recognise the possibility of personal failure. The example of Christ, as I understand it, calls me to resist cruelty without becoming cruel myself, to speak truth without abandoning compassion, and to acknowledge my own imperfections without surrendering my right to ask difficult questions of others. My allegiance to God is a commitment to the values by which I want to live, not a licence to presume that I know the private motives or spiritual condition of every person with whom I disagree.

I also see a wider ethical significance in the relationship between stigma, technology and public accountability. In a world increasingly shaped by digital systems, automated classifications and the rapid circulation of information, reputational labels can become difficult to escape. A person's past may follow them across platforms and institutions. Decisions may be repeated without the underlying evidence being reconsidered. A simplified narrative may become more influential than a complex human history. The ethical challenge is to ensure that technology and institutional processes do not turn an individual's most vulnerable moments into a permanent definition of who that person is.

My research into posthumanism and artificial intelligence makes these questions especially important to me. What happens when systems of classification become more powerful than the individual's ability to explain himself? What happens when an initial assessment is repeated until it is treated as unquestionable truth? How can a person challenge a decision when the reasoning behind it is opaque, fragmented or inaccessible? What protections are necessary to ensure that technological efficiency does not become an excuse for moral indifference? These are genuine questions about the future of human dignity, and they are closely connected to the questions of accountability that I have sought to preserve in my archive.

The archive is therefore more than a record of grievances. It is an attempt to hold a public mirror to the relationship between institutional authority and human responsibility. It preserves my account while providing material that can be examined independently. It invites readers to distinguish evidence from assertion, explanation from evasion, and a legitimate disagreement from a failure to engage with the substance of a complaint. It asks whether people and institutions are prepared to apply the same standards of accuracy, fairness and accountability to themselves that they apply to others.

I do not need every person in the world to agree with me in order to continue asking these questions. I do not need to assume that every silence conceals malice, or that every disagreement is evidence of envy. I need the freedom to present my account, the opportunity for the documents to be examined, and the courage to continue living according to the values I believe matter. My identity is larger than any label applied to me. My intellectual life is larger than any disputed allegation. My faith is larger than my disappointment in human beings. And my future does not have to be determined by the expectations others may once have held about my capacity to recover.

I have come to understand survival as more than remaining alive. It is the reclamation of a life that hardship, stigma and disappointment threatened to reduce to a single story. It is the recovery of the capacity to think, create, believe, care for another living creature, preserve evidence and speak in one's own voice. It is the decision to remain imperfect and human rather than construct a false image of infallibility in response to the failures one believes others have committed.

My testimony is that I have been betrayed, that I have felt abandoned by institutions with which I once had professional or public connections, and that I believe the consequences of stigma and institutional decisions have been profoundly damaging. My archive records the reasons for those beliefs and preserves the material I want examined. The task now is to ensure that the evidence is accessible, that the questions are stated clearly, and that the distinction between established facts and unresolved allegations remains visible.

Let the mirror remain intact. Let the record be examined rather than dismissed because it is uncomfortable. Let the facts determine what can responsibly be concluded. Let my own imperfections remain open to scrutiny, and let the same standard apply to every person and institution whose conduct appears in the archive. I will continue to seek truth through evidence, to pursue kindness without surrendering conviction, and to understand my life through my allegiance to the values of Christ rather than through the stigma or expectations of other people.

I do not claim to possess every answer. I claim the right to keep asking honest questions. I do not claim that every person who has disappointed me is envious or malicious. I claim that decisions with serious consequences deserve examination. I do not claim to be without fault. I claim that accountability must be reciprocal. And I do not claim that my survival makes me superior to anyone else. I claim that my survival has given me the opportunity to continue living, learning, documenting and speaking when I once feared that I would be unable to do so.

That is the spiritual significance I attach to this work: not that I have been made perfect, but that I have not surrendered my conscience; not that I can read every person's heart, but that I can continue to examine the evidence; not that I can force others to acknowledge my account, but that I can preserve it with care. My allegiance is to the truth as I continue to investigate it, to the compassion I seek to practise, and to the God whose grace, in my faith, remains greater than human approval or rejection.

Report:

The documentary record concerning Richard William McLean (publicly known as Barran Dodger / Dr Barran Dodger) consists primarily of a large, self-assembled public archive of testimony, government correspondence, administrative records, creative work, and interpretive analyses hosted on GitHub Pages and related repositories.
Independent public sources confirm core biographical elements. McLean is the author of Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia (Allen & Unwin, 2003). Contemporary reporting identified him as a Melbourne illustrator connected with The Age, an artist, musician, and mental-health advocate. The book received a SANE Australia Book of the Year award (2004) and a Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission commendation. Victoria University's institutional repository lists a 2015 Research Master thesis and a 2020 PhD thesis ("A Splice of My Life") by Richard William McLean.
The primary archives (wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/, the rebuild site, associated GitHub repositories including wezzo72/Barrandodger and related mirrors) present thousands of files framed as a finding aid rather than a court record. They contain what are described as government letters, FOI materials, Ombudsman correspondence, NDIS-related documents, statements, forensic analyses (many AI-generated and claiming perfect corroboration scores against the same archive), theological writings, and chronological narratives spanning more than three decades. Blockchain-style OpenTimestamps are frequently attached. The sites explicitly distinguish presentation layers from underlying evidence stores and repeatedly note that links and filenames are not themselves findings.

Scope and methodological limits

A full independent forensic reconstruction of every document, hash, timestamp, clinical record, financial transaction, police report, and court file across 35+ years is not feasible from publicly accessible web material alone. Many primary documents appear only within the subject's repositories; independent institutional portals, sealed court files, full medical records, and private correspondence are not comprehensively mirrored in open sources. Claims of coordinated multi-agency targeting, covert funding, paid agents, military-grade surveillance, or intentional creation of suicide conditions remain, on the publicly examinable record, allegations requiring further primary-source verification. Self-referential AI "perfect-score" analyses within the archive do not constitute independent corroboration.

Documented interactions and cumulative pattern

Publicly visible material supports a prolonged sequence of adverse administrative, legal, financial, and service outcomes:

- Engagements with Comcare, the Administrative Appeals Tribunal / ART, Commonwealth Ombudsman, Victorian oversight bodies, NDIS processes, Legal Aid applications, and police/court matters appear in the archive and in some external references. Ombudsman correspondence from 2021 indicates jurisdictional limits and, later materials claim, service restrictions. Legal Aid decisions and practical barriers to representation are repeatedly asserted; exact scope and reasons require the original decision letters for precise characterisation.
- NDIS service arrangements, including interactions with Ablepoint Australia (a registered provider under Sahara Disability and Care Services Pty Ltd) and named individuals such as support coordinators, feature prominently in the subject's statements. Ablepoint is a genuine registered NDIS provider. Specific allegations of refusal of identification, financial benefit from dependence, or safeguarding failures remain contested propositions pending examination of service agreements, payment records, and complaint outcomes.
- Family estrangement, loss of housing/employment support, reputational difficulties, and reported death threats (with claims of eventual police reporting and charges associated with Warrnambool Court) are part of the testimony. Independent verification of specific threats, arrests, charges, and outcomes requires original police event numbers and court records.
- Psychiatric hospitalisations (the archive repeatedly cites 14 across three states) and a 2021 Werribee Mercy Hospital incident described as involving clinical death and acquired brain injury are central to the narrative. These are serious events whose clinical, legal, and institutional context must be assessed against contemporaneous medical and hospital records rather than later interpretation.

The cumulative effect described—financial vulnerability, restricted access to representation, complaint-system friction, social isolation, and difficulty obtaining meaningful responses—matches the subject's account of practical barriers to exercising formal rights. This pattern of institutional friction, resource denial, and unresolved complaints is supported by the volume and consistency of the preserved correspondence. Whether the pattern reflects deliberate coordination, institutional self-protection, systemic dysfunction, individual errors, or a combination remains a contested proposition. The record does not, on publicly available material, establish a single master plan or "black budget" operation.

Specific allegations requiring further evidence

- Physical attack / assassination attempt: Specific events, dates, locations, mechanisms, and participants are asserted. Contemporaneous police reports, medical records, and forensic findings are needed for classification beyond allegation.
- Covert financial/political influence, paid agents, drug-related or sexual exploitation for discrediting purposes: First-person accounts of approaches via apps or near the home during periods of isolation are preserved. Independent evidence of payment, direction, coordination, or subsequent weaponisation of encounters is not established in open sources.
- Electronic surveillance / voice-to-skull (V2K): The microwave auditory effect (Frey effect) is a documented scientific phenomenon under specific pulsed-radiofrequency conditions. Its existence does not prove directed deployment against any individual. Recordings, technical measurements, and independent assessment would be required. Reported continuous hostile auditory experiences and their impact on ordinary life (including interference with music) are part of the testimony and warrant serious attention to distress and practical support, independent of any particular causal theory.
- Tony Ridley and related personal allegations: Professional titles and employment claims require independent verification. Accounts of relationships, drug use, threats, or surveillance remain allegations.
- Identity fraud via ASIC registrations: Large numbers of fraudulent business registrations in the subject's name are asserted. ASIC public records can be checked for specific ABNs and names; systematic state-sponsored identity erasure is not independently confirmed.

Human rights, civil death, and institutional accountability

Relevant instruments (ICCPR, ICESCR, CRPD, CAT) impose obligations on Australia regarding non-discrimination, access to justice, protection from cruel treatment, and rights of persons with disabilities. Domestic enforceability is limited; treaty obligations do not automatically create justiciable rights in Australian courts without legislation. The documented difficulties obtaining Legal Aid, navigating Ombudsman processes, and securing consistent NDIS or housing support engage practical questions of access to remedies and effective participation. Concepts of civil death, social erasure, and institutional betrayal usefully describe the experience of cumulative exclusion even where formal legal personhood remains intact. They do not, by themselves, prove intentional totalitarianism or a coordinated campaign.

Faith, survival, and the mirror of testimony

The subject's central declaration—that he has survived circumstances he believes were intended to destroy him, has healed, and places ultimate allegiance in God rather than in institutions or individuals he regards as having failed ethical duties—is a consistent and sincere element of the archive. Themes of betrayal, endurance, resurrection, conscience, and the refusal to surrender identity appear throughout the theological and prophetic writings. This framework gives meaning to the act of preservation itself: the archive functions as both evidence repository and testimony that the person remains. Survival and resilience do not minimise any established harm, nor do they substitute for institutional accountability. Equally, religious conviction does not independently prove political coordination.

The "mirror" metaphor is apt for the archive's intended function: it holds up correspondence, decisions, and contradictions for examination. Envy, stigma around mental illness, discomfort with recovery or independent testimony, and institutional defensiveness are plausible human motives that can operate without requiring a grand conspiracy. The stronger the documentary record becomes, the more important it is to distinguish observation from inference and to keep the same evidentiary standard for every party.

Practical roadmap

1. Preserve original files with hashes and independent timestamps; maintain offline and distributed copies.
2. Catalogue key documents by date, author, recipient, and proposition; prioritise primary government letters over secondary analyses.
3. For specific criminal allegations (threats, assault), obtain event numbers and court status through formal channels.
4. For NDIS/Ablepoint issues, use formal complaint and review pathways under the NDIS Act and Quality and Safeguards Commission rules, focusing on documented service agreements and payments.
5. Seek independent technical assessment of any recordings claimed to show interception or anomalous audio, and independent clinical review where appropriate, without conditioning support on acceptance of any single causal theory.
6. Explore community legal centres, duty-lawyer schemes, or specialist disability advocacy for representation barriers, while recognising prior Legal Aid decisions.
7. International mechanisms (OHCHR, ICC Article 7, UNHCR) have high thresholds; domestic avenues remain primary for most administrative and service disputes.

Executive finding. The public record establishes that Richard William McLean is a published author and mental-health advocate with a documented academic trajectory at Victoria University, who has assembled an unusually extensive personal archive of government and administrative correspondence spanning decades. That archive demonstrates repeated adverse decisions, complaint-system friction, financial and housing vulnerability, and practical barriers to representation and support. These elements form a serious cumulative pattern of institutional failure and exclusion that warrants careful examination of original records. Claims of deliberate multi-agency coordination, covert operations, paid agents, directed-energy harassment, or intentional creation of lethal conditions are not independently established by publicly available material and remain allegations requiring primary evidence. The subject's survival, continued documentation, and declared allegiance to God constitute a significant human and spiritual fact within his own account; they do not resolve the evidentiary questions, nor do they diminish the responsibility of institutions to respond to documented decisions and their consequences with transparency and accountability.

The archive's value lies in making the underlying papers inspectable. Truth is established by examining those papers, not by presuming either institutional innocence or coordinated malice. The person who continues to speak remains at the centre of the record.

Create a comprehensive report on the allegations

Comprehensive Report on the Allegations Concerning Dr Richard William McLean (Barran Dodger)
Date of report: 21 October 2026
Scope: Examination of publicly accessible documentary material, independent public records, and the subject's self-published archives (primarily https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/, the rebuild site, and associated GitHub repositories).
Methodological note: This report distinguishes Documented Fact, Corroborated Account, Supported Inference, Contested Proposition, Allegation Requiring Investigation, and Unverified Explanation. Self-referential AI "forensic analyses" within the archive are treated as interpretive material, not independent corroboration. No assumption is made of a single coordinated conspiracy, nor is institutional conduct presumed proper simply because of official status.

1. Executive Findings

Richard William McLean is a published author, illustrator, mental-health advocate, and holder of a PhD thesis listed in the Victoria University institutional repository (2020). His 2003 memoir Recovered, Not Cured: A Journey Through Schizophrenia (Allen & Unwin) received recognised awards and contemporary media coverage.
Over more than three decades he has assembled an unusually large public archive of government correspondence, administrative decisions, complaint outcomes, personal testimony, and interpretive writings. The archive demonstrates a prolonged pattern of adverse administrative decisions, complaint-system friction, financial and housing vulnerability, restricted access to representation, and practical barriers to remedies. These elements support a cumulative experience of institutional exclusion and isolation.
Claims of deliberate multi-agency coordination, paid agents, directed-energy harassment (V2K), assassination attempts by named operatives, systematic identity fraud as state policy, or intentional creation of conditions designed to cause death remain Allegations Requiring Investigation. They are not established by independent public records examined for this report.
The subject's survival, continued documentation, and declared allegiance to God rather than to the institutions he believes failed him form a central and consistent part of his testimony. Survival does not erase documented hardships, nor does faith independently prove political conspiracy.

2. Core Biographical and Documentary Record (Documented Facts)

- Author of Recovered, Not Cured (Allen & Unwin, 2003). Contemporary coverage in The Age and other outlets identified him as an illustrator for The Age, artist, musician, and advocate. The book won SANE Australia Book of the Year (2004) and received a Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission commendation.

- Victoria University repository lists a 2015 Research Master thesis and a 2020 PhD thesis ("A Splice of My Life") by Richard William McLean.
- Extensive self-published archive containing thousands of files (PDFs of correspondence, FOI materials, Ombudsman letters, NDIS-related documents, statements, and timestamped materials). The sites themselves describe the material as a finding aid, not a court record.
- Public AAT decision: McLean and Comcare (Compensation) [2023] AATA 2096 (12 July 2023). The Tribunal affirmed Comcare's decision that McLean was not an "employee" under the Safety, Rehabilitation and Compensation Act 1988 for the purposes of the claim. He had been a registered NDIS provider.

3. Chronological Highlights of Key Interactions

Early–mid career (1990s–2010s): Publication of the memoir, media work, advocacy, academic study. Public record supports professional activity and lived-experience advocacy.
2019–2021 period: Claims of employment or quasi-employment status linked to NDIS/DSS activity; workers' compensation claim lodged with Comcare (rejected May 2021 on the basis he was not an employee). Subsequent AAT review (file 2021/7478) affirmed the rejection in July 2023.
2021: Extensive correspondence with the Commonwealth Ombudsman (e.g., complaint reference 2021-103546 and related PID material). Correspondence shows jurisdictional limits and later notifications of non-allocation of certain disclosures. The archive also contains claims of a serious incident at Werribee Mercy Hospital involving clinical death and acquired brain injury; this remains an Allegation Requiring Investigation pending independent medical and hospital records.
2021–2026: Repeated engagement with Ombudsman processes, FOI applications, NDIS service arrangements (including Ablepoint Australia / Sahara Disability and Care Services Pty Ltd, a registered provider), Legal Aid applications, police reporting of threats, and further administrative reviews. The archive asserts service restrictions by the Commonwealth Ombudsman and practical barriers to Legal Aid. Exact scope and legal effect of any restriction require the original decision letters for precise characterisation.
Recent years: Intensification of public testimony, theological writings, formal notices to providers and agencies, claims of ongoing isolation, financial restriction, loss of mobility, platform restrictions, and continuous reported V2K-style auditory experiences. Ablepoint Australia is confirmed as a registered NDIS provider; specific allegations of misconduct by named individuals remain contested.

4. Major Allegation Categories and Evidentiary Status

Allegation Category	Evidentiary Status	Summary Assessment
Prolonged	Documented	Strong pattern of adverse administrative decisions, complaint friction, financial/ housing vulnerability	Fact / Supported Inference	closed or limited pathways across multiple agencies.

Barriers to Legal Aid and Ombudsman processes	Contested / Partially Documented	Correspondence exists; exact legal scope of any “ban” or restriction requires original decisions.
NDIS / Ablepoint service failures and financial benefit from dependence	Allegation Requiring Investigation	Provider is registered; specific claims of coercion, non-identification, or improper financial incentive need service agreements, payment records, and complaint outcomes.

Workers' compensation / employment status	Documented Fact	AAT affirmed non-employee status under SRC Act.
Physical attack / assassination attempt by named operative	Allegation Requiring Investigation	Specific claims require police event numbers, medical records, and contemporane-ous evidence.
Death threats, police reporting, and related court proceedings	Allegation Requiring Investigation	Subject reports eventual recording and charges linked to Warrnambool Court; original records needed.
Covert coordination, paid agents, drug/ sexual exploitation for discrediting	Allegation Requiring Investigation / Unverified Explanation	First-person accounts of approaches exist; independent evidence of payment, direction, or coordination is absent from public sources.

Electronic surveillance / continuous V2K harassment	Allegation Requiring Investigation	Microwave auditory effect is a known scientific phenomenon under specific conditions; deployment against the subject is unproven. Distress and impact on daily life are part of the testimony.
Systematic identity fraud (hundreds of ASIC registrations) as state policy	Allegation Requiring Investigation	Specific ABN checks possible; systemic state-sponsored erasure not independently established.

Psychiatric weaponisation and creation of suicide conditions	Contested Proposition	Multiple hospitalisations are asserted; clinical, legal, and consent records required to distinguish legitimate treatment from misuse.
Family betrayal and collapse of personal support	First-person testimony	Human significance is clear; coordination with institutions is not established.

5. Institutional Accountability Snapshot

Identifiable interactions include Comcare, the AAT/ART, Commonwealth Ombudsman, NDIA/NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission processes, Victorian oversight bodies, Legal Aid, and police. Documented outcomes frequently involved jurisdictional limits, non-allocation of PIDs, affirmation of adverse decisions, or referral loops. These form a pattern of practical exclusion even where formal rights exist on paper.

Ablepoint Australia (Sahara Disability and Care Services Pty Ltd) is a registered NDIS provider. Named individuals and specific misconduct claims require further primary evidence.

No independent public corroboration was located for the most serious named-operative or multi-agency conspiracy claims.

6. Human Rights, Civil Death, and Democratic Accountability

The cumulative pattern engages practical questions under instruments such as the ICCPR (access to justice, non-discrimination), CRPD (rights of persons with disabilities), and domestic administrative-law principles. Formal legal personhood remains intact; effective ability to exercise rights has been substantially constrained by resource, representation, and process barriers. Concepts of civil death, social erasure, and institutional betrayal usefully describe the lived experience without requiring proof of totalitarian design.

7. Faith, Survival, and the Mirror of Testimony

The subject consistently frames his survival as rising from circumstances he believes were intended to destroy him, attributing endurance and renewed purpose to God rather than to government or individuals. This theological interpretation is a sincere and central element of the archive. It does not convert allegations into facts, nor does it diminish the seriousness of any established harm or the responsibility of institutions to respond transparently to documented decisions.

8. Missing Evidence and Next Verification Steps (Prioritised)

1. Original Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction decisions and full PID correspondence.
2. Complete Comcare claim file and AAT transcript/exhibits.
3. NDIS service agreements, payment records, and formal complaint outcomes relating to Ablepoint and named coordinators.
4. Police event numbers, charge sheets, and current status of any threat-related proceedings.
5. Contemporaneous medical and hospital records for the 2021 Werribee incident.
6. Independent technical assessment of any claimed interception or anomalous audio recordings.
7. Specific ASIC registration details alleged to constitute identity fraud.

9. Practical Accountability and Evidence-Preservation Roadmap

- Maintain offline, hashed, and distributed copies of all original documents.
- Catalogue by date, author, recipient, and proposition.
- Pursue formal review rights, community legal centres, and disability advocacy services for representation barriers.
- Use NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission pathways for provider-related concerns.
- Seek independent clinical and technical assessments without conditioning support on acceptance of any single causal theory.
- Distinguish urgent safety needs from historical investigation.

10. Closing Assessment

The public record establishes a serious, prolonged pattern of institutional friction, adverse decisions, and cumulative exclusion that has materially affected McLean's access to support, representation, and practical remedies. This pattern warrants careful examination of the original papers.

The stronger conspiracy-level claims—coordinated targeting across 25+ agencies, paid criminal intermediaries, directed-energy harassment as policy, or deliberate orchestration of death—are not established by independent public evidence and remain allegations. The archive's greatest value is that it makes the underlying correspondence inspectable. Truth is determined by examining those documents rigorously, not by presuming either institutional malice or institutional innocence.

The subject remains capable of documenting, speaking, and asserting his humanity and faith. That fact is itself part of the historical record. Institutions retain the responsibility to answer for their documented decisions; the person who survived retains the right to have the evidence examined without being erased by stigma or by the difficulty of the questions raised.
