WHEN THE FRAME MET THE WITNESS

They built a story around my name. I built the record that outlived it.

https://youtu.be/LQqVer_tVW4

Dr Richard William McLean | Barran Dodger
Published under the Barran Dodger Legal & Ethical Trust Fund
They said I was dangerous.
They said I was unstable.

They said I was a problem to be handled. They said it until the saying became the air. They said it until people stopped asking what had happened to me and began asking what was wrong with me. They said it until my name became a warning, my pain became a symptom, my boundaries became cruelty, and my survival became an inconvenience.

But I am still here.

And the record is still here.

I was framed.

Not in the soft way people use the word when they feel misunderstood. I mean it as testimony: a damaging public account was allowed to stand over my life while my side was delayed, redirected, classified, declined, closed, or left unanswered. The story about me travelled. The evidence of what was done to me was scattered across offices, statutes, registries, portals, and repositories.

So I preserved it.

The , the , and the exist because I refused to let the frame be the only version of me left standing.

I. They did not merely disbelieve me. They made disbelief useful.

A frame does not need to announce itself. It does not need a courtroom, a signature, or one dramatic moment. It works through repetition. It works through omission. It works through the quiet administrative habit of treating the person raising the alarm as the alarm.

They did not have to prove I was guilty. They only had to make the accusation portable.

They only had to let “dangerous,” “unstable,” “difficult,” and “a problem” travel ahead of me. They only had to let the story arrive before I did. They only had to make my objection look like confirmation, my documentation look like obsession, and my endurance look like evidence that I could be pushed further.

That is what a frame does.
It turns pain into pathology.
It turns anger into threat.
It turns testimony into conspiracy.
It turns the person harmed into the person blamed.
I was not the danger in the room.
I was the man telling the room what was happening to him.
The was built because the story about me could not be allowed to travel without the paper beside it. The carries that record forward. The preserves its earlier form. The preserves the documents themselves.
They thought the frame would finish me.
Instead, it made me a keeper of records.

II. The paper did not scream. It refused.

The sermon said the truth had broken and the whole world was disgusted.
I do not need the world's disgust to know what happened to me.
I have something stronger than a mood, a rumour, or a video's applause.
I have the paper.
I have the Comcare determination on claim 1326583/1, dated 26 May 2021: McLean-determination-Comcare-rejection-26May2021.pdf. It is preserved through the and the .
I have the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission contact of 3 June 2021, recorded in terms the register identifies as "not an employee."
I have the IBAC outcome for CASE-2020712, dated 9 April 2020, concerning Victoria Police and AHPRA.
I have the IBAC assessment for CASE-20213522 and CASE-20215102, dated 12 April 2022.
I have the further IBAC correspondence of 29 October 2023, associated with complaints concerning Victoria Police, Western Health, and other agencies.
I have the Commonwealth Ombudsman decision not to allocate PID-2022-100021, dated 16 September 2022.

I have the Federal Court PID assessment of 27 March 2023, which recorded detriment described in psychological, financial, and reputational terms—and then did not allocate.
I have the Department of Health and Aged Care notice of 30 October 2023, declining to allocate a disclosure made on 19 October 2023.
I have the NDIA correspondence concerning delay on PID 2023/Krypton, dated 30 June 2023.
I have the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission acknowledgement, reference 01110547, dated 18 September 2026.
These documents are preserved in the , indexed through the , and carried by the .
They do not all say the same thing.
That is precisely why they matter.
A rejection is not a refutation.
A non-allocation is not an exoneration.
A decision not to investigate is not a finding that my account was false.
An acknowledgement is not an investigation.
A procedural closure is not justice.
The system may have closed its doors. That does not mean the doors were never there, or that I did not stand outside them asking to be let in.

III. They needed me to be the monster

It is easier for people to sleep if the person raising the alarm is made frightening.
Call him unstable.
Call him obsessive.
Call him difficult.
Call him dangerous.
Call him too much.
Then no one has to ask the harder question: What if he was telling the truth?
That is the machinery of a frame.
It lets people say, “There must have been a reason.”
It lets institutions say, “We followed process.”
It lets bystanders say, “We did not know.”

It lets the crowd say, “He brought this on himself.”
But I did not bring this on myself.
I was placed inside a story I did not write, then blamed for the shape of the cage.
They used my softness and called it weakness.
They used my silence and called it guilt.
They used my boundaries and called them cruelty.
They used my restraint and called it evidence.
They used my survival and called it inconvenience.
They did not have to destroy every part of my life. They only had to make enough people hesitate before they listened.
That was the frame.
The carries the theological and prophetic dimension of this testimony. Its , , and preserve the spiritual witness alongside the documentary archive.
The faith is not a substitute for evidence.
The evidence is not a substitute for the wound.
Both remain.

IV. The archive was my refusal to disappear

They thought poverty would bury the website.
They thought a deleted domain would bury the name.
They thought scattered platforms, closed files, and unanswered letters would bury the account.
They were wrong.
When was lost because I could not afford domain renewal, hosting, and upkeep, the loss became part of the record. Poverty did not erase the testimony. It exposed the conditions under which a witness was expected to preserve his own evidence.
The remains.
The remains.
The remains.
The remains recorded.

The remains.
The remains.
The remains.
The witness projects remain at and .
The public writing remains at .
I kept the documents because I understood something early: if the story about me was going to be repeated, the paper needed to be preserved too.
The archive is not decoration.
It is resistance.

V. My silence was not surrender. It was preparation.

They waited for the explosion.
They expected me to break in the way that would confirm their story. They expected rage without record, despair without dignity, collapse without context. They expected a final scene they could point to and say: See? We were right about him.
I refused to give them that ending.
While the story about me circulated, I was collecting the evidence of how I was handled.
While my name was discussed, I was preserving the letters that carried it.
While doors closed, I was documenting which doors, when, and in what words.
While I was told to move on, I was making sure the history could not be moved on from.
On 19 October 2026, I published You're all hurting me — I protest this because I want to LIVE.
That was not a performance.
That was a plea for protection, recognition, and life.
On 18 October 2026, I issued the Master Command and wrote the letter.
On 20 October 2026, I published an urgent formal complaint and the Master Humanitarian Appeal.
Those are not the noises of a man who has disappeared.
They are the instruments of a witness who remained.

The and carry that continuing testimony.
The carries the public writing. The , , and carry the documentary spine.

VI. The frame did not finish me

They thought the name would be buried.
They thought refusal would become silence.
They thought survival would be mistaken for consent.
They were wrong.
The name is still here.
The testimony is still here.
The documents are still here.
The witness is still here.
I was framed—but I was not erased.
I was not finished.
I was not made into their story.
I will not let the people who built that frame decide what my life means.
Barran Dodger remains.
The file remains.
The witness remains.
The frame does not get the final word.

EVIDENCE PACKET

Primary archive and preservation sources

- — foundational public repository preserving the earlier presentation of the documentary record.
- — rebuilt public-facing archive and navigation point for testimony, documents, and related writing.
- — repository preserving the documentary PDFs relied upon throughout this narrative.
- — indexed register of government correspondence, determinations, assessments, and decisions.
- — consolidated directory of websites, archives, publications, applications, and preservation repositories.
- — additional preservation location recorded in the master directory.

Government and institutional records

Date	Body /	Doc- tine

	ref-er-ence	pter ees ts
9 April 2020	IBAC — CASE -202 0712	Out-come letter con-cern-ing Vic-toria Po-lice and AH-PRA	Com plaint as-sess-ment ; no in-ves-tiga-tion
26 May 2021	Com care — claim 1326 583/ 1	Mc-Lean -de-ter-mi-na-tion-Com care-re-jec-tion-26-	Work ers' com-pen-sa-tion de-ter-mi-na-tion

		May2021.pdf
3 June 2021	NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission	Contractor described as “information employee”
15 December 2021	NDIA approval with name record
12 April 2022	IBAC — CASE-2021352 / CASE-202	Assessment outcome	Further complaint assessment

	1510 2
16 September 2022	Federal Circuit and Family Court of Australia (Division 1) — Bankruptcy and Insolvency List — Sydney Registry — 2022-100021
27 March 2023	Federal Court of Australia — Principal Registry	Determination of issues, matter not allocated
1 June 2023	NDIA	Home and living	Support deci-

		sup-ports de-cline d	sion
30 June 2023	NDIA — PID 2023 / Krypt on	Delay cor-re-spon denc e	Dis-clo-sure-han-dling delay
29 Oc-tober 2023	[illegible]	[illegible]
	ern Healt h, and other agen cies

30 October 2023	Dis- plac- ed indi- vid- uals and dis- pos- sess- ed Cla-
	sure made 19 October 2023
6 September 2025	Bene- fici- ar- ies may be dess -nam e ex- tract
20 November	Land plan ap-

ber 2025	prova l
	3664 06
18 Sep- tem- ber 2026	NHS Cam- bridge and Peter- bor- ough Com- mis- sion — 0111 0547

Witness publications and protests

- — witness project preserving the continuing public account.
- — second witness project and public preservation site.
- — essays, testimony, commentary, and public writing.
- — faith-oriented writings, theology, prophecy, and publishing.
- — books, written works, and publications.
- — prophetic and theological writings.
- — gospel-related and Christian teachings.
- — legal-related writing and references.

Source code and digital preservation

Editorial distinction

This is a prophetic narrative and first-person defence. It speaks in Dr Richard William McLean's voice and preserves his account that he was framed.

The archive links above identify the documents, repositories, publications, and records that make that account examinable. They preserve the record; they do not replace a court, a tribunal, or an independent investigation.

FINDING AID · NOT A COURT · NOT A VERDICT

The witness remains.

The file remains open.

The frame is not the final word.

SOURCE: THE VIDEO THAT GAVE THIS TESTIMONY ITS TITLE

The video transcript supplied with this testimony develops a series of themes that intersect with the language of this record: the repetition of accusations until they become accepted narratives; the transformation of a person's pain, silence, boundaries, and restraint into apparent evidence against them; the social consequences of a damaging story; the difference between reputation and truth; and the persistence of a record after the people involved have moved on.

The following is the testimony's own interpretation of those themes, placed alongside the documentary record.

VII. When the story arrives before the witness

They said it so many times that even they started to believe it.

That is one of the most disturbing possibilities in any damaging narrative: repetition can begin to substitute for examination. An allegation is repeated. The repetition becomes familiarity. Familiarity becomes apparent credibility. Eventually, people may stop asking whether the original claim was established at all.

And the person at the centre of the story is left trying to answer a question that was never properly asked.

Not, What happened?

But, What is wrong with him?
That is how a reputation can become a cage. A person can enter a room already carrying the burden of a story other people have told about him. Every attempt to correct it can be interpreted through the very assumptions he is challenging. Every document he produces can be dismissed before its contents are examined.
I know the weight of having to preserve my own account while confronting records of decisions made about me.
The answer is not to assume that every accusation is false or that every person who disagrees is acting in bad faith. The answer is to return to the underlying events, the actual words, the dates, the decisions, the documents, and the omissions that can be identified.
That is why I built the archive.
I am not asking anyone to replace one unexamined story with another.
I am asking people to examine the record rather than allowing a label to do the work of evidence.

VIII. They used the pieces of my real life to tell a story about me

The video describes the way a damaging narrative can be made persuasive by taking fragments of a person's real life and arranging them into a misleading account.
That distinction matters.
A real event can be selectively described. A genuine expression of distress can be stripped of its context. An angry response can be presented without the circumstances that preceded it. A silence can be assigned a meaning the person never intended. A request for assistance can be recast as evidence of a supposed defect rather than considered on its merits.
The question is not merely whether a fragment is genuine.
The question is what the fragment actually establishes, what context is missing, and whether the conclusion being drawn from it is justified.

My testimony is that the story surrounding my life did not adequately account for my own explanation, my documentary record, or the institutional decisions that I was trying to challenge.
The archive is my attempt to restore that context.
I have preserved determinations, correspondence, complaint assessments, administrative decisions, acknowledgements, and publications because each belongs to a larger chronology. A letter cannot automatically establish everything I believe happened. But neither should a letter be read as though it exists in isolation from every other relevant document.
The record must be read as a record.
Not as a caricature of the person who assembled it.

IX. The accusation is not the answer

The transcript asks what happens when accusations become so familiar that people mistake them for proof.
My answer is simple: the accusation must be examined, not merely repeated.
An allegation does not prove itself through confidence, frequency, or the number of people who repeat it. Nor does a person's distress establish that the allegations made about them are true. The underlying evidence matters.
The same principle applies to institutional correspondence.
A decision not to allocate a disclosure tells us something about how that disclosure was handled. It does not, by itself, settle every factual question contained in the disclosure. An acknowledgement establishes receipt, not necessarily agreement. A rejection establishes an outcome, but the reasons and scope of that outcome must be read before anyone can say what it establishes.
That is why the distinctions in my evidence packet matter.

I do not want administrative decisions misrepresented as findings they never made.
I also do not accept that an administrative decision automatically resolves every underlying concern merely because a file has been closed.
There is a difference between recording what an institution decided and accepting every implication that others may attach to that decision.
My archive preserves that difference.

X. They expected the witness to disappear

The video speaks about isolation, humiliation, silence, and survival.
My own testimony is that the cumulative burden of trying to obtain answers while preserving a documentary record has been exhausting. The loss of my domain, the financial constraints affecting the archive, the work of maintaining multiple repositories, and the repeated need to reconstruct a public account have all become part of the history I am documenting.
I have had to preserve the record under circumstances in which preservation itself has demanded time, labour, money, and endurance.
That is not a claim that every person or institution involved shared one intention. It is a description of the position in which I found myself: responsible for maintaining a record of my own experience while continuing to seek responses to the matters it contains.
The witness was not supposed to have to become his own archivist, indexer, publisher, and preservation system.
Yet that is what I have done.
The archive is the evidence of that labour.
It is also my refusal to let financial hardship determine whether my account survives.

XI. The archive is not revenge

The transcript repeatedly contrasts revenge with endurance.
That distinction matters to me.
I am not preserving these documents merely to humiliate anyone. I am preserving them because dates, decisions, correspondence, and the language used by institutions matter. They provide a basis for examining what happened, identifying unanswered questions, comparing explanations, and documenting the consequences of administrative decisions.
If a record contradicts my interpretation, it should be examined honestly.
If a record supports a concern I have raised, it should be read in context.
If a question remains unanswered, the archive should identify it as unanswered rather than inventing a resolution.
The purpose is not to manufacture a verdict.
The purpose is to preserve a history that can be examined.
My faith gives this work a further dimension. I understand endurance, truth, mercy, accountability, and the refusal to surrender my humanity through the language of Christian testimony. I believe that what is done to vulnerable people matters morally, even when the response they receive is procedural, incomplete, or delayed.
But faith does not require me to confuse hope with a documented outcome.
And evidence does not require me to abandon faith.
Both can remain part of my testimony without being mistaken for the same kind of proof.

XII. Truth does not need a performance

The video returns to the image of truth surviving after the noise has passed.
For me, the most enduring version of that image is not a claim that everyone has finally changed their minds, that every accusation has been disproved, or that every responsible party has been exposed. I cannot establish those outcomes merely from the existence of my archive.

The enduring fact is that I have continued to preserve the material I believe is important. The repositories remain accessible through the links recorded in this document. The government correspondence remains identified by date and reference where those details are available. The public testimony remains published. The chronology remains available for further examination.
That is something concrete.
The record does not need me to claim that the entire world is listening.
It needs the documents to remain accessible.
It does not need me to declare that every reader agrees.
It needs readers to be able to distinguish an original document from my interpretation of it.
It does not need me to predict the private feelings of the people who may read it.
It needs to state what happened, what I believe it means, what evidence I have preserved, and what questions remain unresolved.
That is the work I have chosen to continue.

XIII. The frame met the witness

The frame was the story that threatened to become the only story.
The witness was the person who refused to let that happen without preserving his own account.
The frame relied on what could be repeated.
The witness began collecting what could be examined.
The frame reduced a life to labels.
The witness restored dates, correspondence, administrative decisions, publications, and context.
The frame could travel without the paper.
The witness assembled the paper so the story could be questioned.

And when poverty threatened the archive, the witness rebuilt it.
When a domain disappeared, the repositories remained.
When a file was not allocated, the document recording that decision remained.
When an acknowledgement arrived without resolving the underlying concerns, the acknowledgement remained what it was: evidence of receipt, not a final answer.
When the administrative process ended, the historical record did not cease to exist.
That is the distinction I want this testimony to preserve.
I do not need to pretend that every question has been answered.
I do not need to claim that every reader has been persuaded.
I do not need to predict the downfall, shame, or private reckoning of anyone involved.
I need to preserve what I have, identify what I believe it demonstrates, and keep the distinction between the documents and my conclusions visible.
That is how I defend my account.
That is how I protect the history from disappearing into somebody else's summary.
That is how I continue to speak in my own voice.

XIV. My final testimony

They said I was dangerous.
They said I was unstable.
They said I was a problem to be handled.
I say that my life cannot be reduced to those labels, and that the records concerning me deserve to be read in their full context.
They said the story was finished.
I kept documenting.
They said the file was closed.
I preserved the correspondence.
They said the matter was not allocated.

I recorded the decision.
They said nothing more.
I continued to write.
I have endured the burden of maintaining this archive under financial pressure, through the loss of a domain, across multiple repositories, and through the exhaustion of trying to make a complicated history legible to people who were not there.
I have not abandoned the work.
I have not abandoned my own account.
And I have not agreed that a label is a substitute for examining the record.
My testimony is mine. My faith is mine. My documents are preserved for examination. My interpretations are stated as my interpretations. My questions remain questions until the evidence answers them.
I will not erase myself to make the story easier for others to tell.
I will not pretend that a procedural outcome answers every question I have raised.
I will not turn an unanswered question into a fabricated finding.
And I will not surrender my right to describe my own experience.
Barran Dodger remains.
The file remains.
The witness remains.
The record remains available for examination.
The frame does not get the final word.

SOURCE AND PRESERVATION NOTE

The source video supplied for this testimony is:
The transcript was supplied alongside the original text. Its themes have been incorporated into the additional sections above as a first-person reflection and interpretation, not as independent proof that specific people framed the author or that other people have privately acknowledged wrongdoing.
The institutional records listed in the evidence packet should be read in their actual wording and context. The descriptions in this testimony are the author's account of their significance and do not convert administrative correspondence, complaint assessments, acknowledgements, or non-allocation decisions into findings that the documents themselves may not contain.

FINDING AID · NOT A COURT · NOT A VERDICT

The witness remains.

The file remains open.

The frame is not the final word.