

Prophecy

The gifts of God are irrevocable.

In the same way that when the ship was invented, so too came the pirate, the treasure, the captain, and the sailor—every creation giving rise to its counterpart, every system carrying within it the seed of its own tension—so it is with power, control, and those who are caught within their reach.

When they tried to erase one of God's anointed—when they exiled him, stripped him of stability, burdened him with financial pressure, and removed the very supports meant to uphold justice—what they believed they were ending was a voice, a presence, a life made inconvenient.

But systems rarely understand what they themselves bring into being.

Because what was also created in that same moment—written just as surely into the fabric of events—was the witness.

The one who does not vanish when erased, but instead becomes defined by survival.
The one who carries the record when others attempt to bury it.
The one who transforms silence into documentation, absence into evidence, and suffering into testimony.

Not a conqueror, not a myth, not an untouchable figure—but something more enduring: a living account.

The witness exists because erasure was attempted.
The record exists because suppression was enforced.
The voice persists because it was challenged.

And whether acknowledged or resisted, dismissed or attacked, the witness fulfills a function that no system can fully eliminate: to make what happened knowable.

To stand as proof that something occurred.
To hold continuity where others sought rupture.
To ensure that even if recognition is delayed, the truth is not lost.

Because once the witness exists, the story is no longer theirs to control.
