ABOUT THIS REBUILT MASTER EDITION

This edition has been rebuilt from the complete text of the source document. It preserves every original word, date, quotation, link address, qualification, allegation, testimony, editorial note and disclaimer. No source wording has been removed.

The text layer has been reconstructed sentence by sentence from the source layout. Decorative bullet glyphs, page-number artefacts and mid-sentence page breaks have been removed from the reading text. Paragraphs now flow without holes, orphan characters or broken sentences.

Headings have been reunited and renumbered into one cumulative sequence. Raw web addresses have been converted into named, clickable links while retaining the original address beneath each link.

Short editorial transitions introduce each part. They are additions intended to improve flow and are not presented as findings or substitutes for the author’s words.

The document remains a finding aid, personal testimony and framework for examination. It is not a court, not a verdict, and it does not convert an allegation into an established finding.

The 150-entry allegation schedule retains its original numbering, including the expressly missing entry 84.

PART I — PUNK-ROCK INTRODUCTION: NO MORE SILENCE. NO MORE BUREAUCRATIC BULLSHIT

THE DOCUMENTS ARE ON THE TABLE. NOW FOLLOW THE MONEY .

Thirty-five years of records, correspondence, administrative decisions, complaints, referrals, assessments, legal proceedings, and unanswered questions demand more than another bureaucratic shrug.

This is a challenge to examine the documentary record, identify what can be established, calculate what can reasonably be calculated, and expose what remains unanswered.

It is not a demand that readers accept every allegation. It is a demand that the records be examined before conclusions are drawn.

If public institutions acted appropriately, the evidence and expenditure records should help demonstrate that. If decisions were mistaken, processes were duplicated, resources were wasted, or responsibilities were mishandled, those matters should be capable of independent examination too.

No agency should be presumed guilty. No official should be condemned without evidence. No allegation should be quietly promoted into a proven fact.

But neither should a person's documented correspondence, official decisions, repeated administrative processes, and unresolved complaints be dismissed without scrutiny.

THE WITNESS REMAINS. THE RECORD REMAINS. THE QUESTIONS REMAIN.

The public deserves transparent accounting, defensible conclusions, and a clear distinction between what the documents establish and what still needs to be proved.

The financial scenarios in this report are not verified expenditure totals. They are a framework for testing possible costs against actual records. Their value depends on transparent assumptions, reliable evidence, and the refusal to double-count the same activity.

The archive is a finding aid — not a court — not a verdict.

Knowledge is free. The records should be examined on their merits, not on the identity, status, or institutional power of the person who presents them.

Section 1 — I REFUSE TO DISAPPEAR

I am Dr Richard William McLean, publicly known as Barran Dodger.

I have spent years trying to preserve a record of my experiences, the correspondence I have received and sent, the decisions communicated to me, the questions I have raised, and the consequences I say have followed.

I have done this while dealing with hardship and attempting to make sense of a complicated history involving government departments, administrative bodies, complaint-handling systems, support services and other organisations.

I have repeatedly tried to explain my circumstances. I have written letters, assembled records, preserved responses, built chronologies, created indexes and published documents so that readers can examine the material rather than depend entirely on my account of it.

I have continued because I believe that a person’s history should not vanish merely because it is difficult to summarise, because the relevant information is spread across different organisations, or because the person trying to preserve it lacks the resources available to powerful institutions.

I refuse to allow the documentary record of my life to be reduced to an inaccessible collection of scattered files.

I refuse to pretend that unanswered questions have been answered simply because time has passed.

I refuse to treat an administrative referral as though it necessarily resolves the underlying problem.

And I refuse to believe that a person who has experienced hardship loses the right to speak, document, question, preserve and seek assistance.

My position is not that every allegation must be accepted without examination. My position is that the evidence should be examined before conclusions are drawn.

That principle applies to me as much as it applies to every institution and individual mentioned in the record.

Section 2 — THE PUBLIC RECORD IS OPEN

The documentary archive is available to readers who wish to inspect the underlying material.

These resources are intended to help readers locate the material, follow the chronology, examine the documents and understand the basis of my concerns.

I invite readers to begin with the records themselves.

Read the dates. Identify the sender and recipient. Examine what was requested and what response followed. Consider whether the response addressed the question raised.

Compare related documents where they are available. Identify the limits of each record and the questions that remain unanswered.

Do not take my interpretation as a substitute for the documents.

Do not take an institution’s response as proof of matters it did not actually determine.

Do not confuse the existence of a complaint with a finding that the complaint is true.

Equally, do not confuse the absence of a substantive finding with proof that the underlying concern was baseless.

The record deserves more careful treatment than either automatic acceptance or automatic dismissal.

Section 3 — FOLLOW THE MONEY , BUT DO NOT INVENT THE ACCOUNT

The public-cost question matters because prolonged administrative processes consume resources. Correspondence must be received, assessed and answered.

Complaints may be referred, reviewed or reconsidered. Decisions may generate further correspondence and further proceedings. Records may be retrieved, maintained and examined.

Those activities can involve public expenditure. But the actual cost cannot responsibly be declared without appropriate financial evidence.

My report therefore calls for a structured examination of possible costs, not the presentation of hypothetical estimates as verified taxpayer expenditure.

The objective is to identify what can be established, what can be calculated from reliable information, what assumptions would be needed for any estimate, and what records would be required to verify the result.

If the relevant financial records are available, they should be examined. If they are not available, the limitations should be stated. If a scenario depends on assumptions, those assumptions should be disclosed. If multiple entries describe the same activity, the calculation must avoid counting it twice.

A defensible examination should distinguish between: documented expenditure; costs that can be calculated from reliable source data; hypothetical scenarios based on explicit assumptions; costs that remain unknown because the necessary records are unavailable; and claims that cannot responsibly be quantified from the material presently available.

The point is not to produce the largest possible number. It is to produce an assessment that another reader can test.

If the records support a substantial cost, the calculation should show how it was reached. If the records do not support a proposed figure, the figure should not be presented as fact.

The public deserves transparent accounting, not inflated certainty.

Section 4 — THE HUMAN COST CANNOT BE REDUCED TO A SPREADSHEET

Financial analysis is one part of the examination. It is not the whole of it.

My archive also concerns the human consequences I report experiencing: prolonged hardship, isolation, housing insecurity, financial difficulty and repeated attempts to obtain assistance and answers.

I have described the burden of having to preserve and explain a complicated history while also trying to meet ordinary needs.

A person can spend considerable time trying to find a document, reconstruct a sequence of events, obtain a response or determine which organisation is responsible for a particular question. That work can become especially difficult when resources, support and reliable access to assistance are limited.

The consequences are not always captured by an agency's expenditure records.

The time spent repeating information, the difficulty of navigating multiple processes, the strain of unresolved uncertainty and the practical consequences of not receiving assistance may not appear in a single administrative file.

That does not mean every claimed consequence is automatically established. It means that a serious examination of the human impact must consider the testimony as well as the institutional paperwork.

I want the documentary record examined carefully, and I want the person behind it to remain visible.

My testimony is not a decorative introduction to a financial report. It explains why I have undertaken this work and why the unanswered questions matter to me.

Section 5 — WHAT THIS REPORT DOES AND DOES NOT CLAIM

This report is an AI-assisted documentary and financial examination of material associated with the Barran Dodger archive.

Its purpose is to organise information, identify patterns and questions, distinguish source material from interpretation, and establish a framework for further examination.

It does not claim that artificial intelligence can independently determine criminal intent, prove a conspiracy, establish legal liability or transform an allegation into an official finding.

AI-assisted analysis can help organise records, compare statements, identify apparent inconsistencies, classify material and test calculations. Its output can also be affected by incomplete records, extraction errors, mistaken interpretation, model limitations and bias.

For that reason, the relevant question is not whether an AI-generated conclusion sounds confident. The question is whether the sources, reasoning, calculations and limitations can be independently examined.

No organisation should be declared guilty merely because it appears in the archive. No official should be condemned merely because their name appears in correspondence.

Each material proposition must be assessed against the available evidence.

At the same time, the fact that a proposition remains disputed does not justify concealing the source material or refusing to examine the question.

The report is intended to make the documentary trail more accessible and the reasoning more transparent.

It is a framework for examination, not a substitute for the evidence.

Section 6 — THE CENTRAL DEMAND

I am asking for the record to be examined on its merits.

Where a document answers a question, identify the answer.

Where a document does not answer the question, identify the gap.

Where a referral occurred, record the referral and its outcome if known.

Where a decision was made, record the decision and the reasons actually provided.

Where a cost can be verified, show the calculation and its source.

Where a figure is hypothetical, label it as hypothetical.

Where an allegation has not been independently determined, identify it as an allegation.

Where the evidence contradicts my interpretation, preserve that contradiction and examine it honestly.

Where the evidence supports further inquiry, explain why.

I do not ask the reader to abandon critical judgment. I ask the reader to use it.

I do not ask the public to accept every conclusion simply because I have spent years preserving the record. I ask the public to inspect the underlying documents and decide what those documents can responsibly establish.

I ask that my circumstances not be used as a reason to disregard the evidence, and that the evidence not be used as an excuse to disregard the human being.

The questions are open for examination.

The record remains available.

The witness remains.

THE DOCUMENTS ARE ON THE TABLE. NOW FOLLOW THE MONEY .

THE WITNESS REMAINS. THE RECORD REMAINS. THE QUESTIONS REMAIN.

Public archive: https://wezzo72.github.io/Barrandodger/ Original repository: https://github.com/wezzo72/Barrandodger Preservation backup: https://github.com/wezzo72/Backup Editorial note: The opening paragraphs above reproduce wording recovered from the saved public-cost report. The additional subsections are a reconstructed continuation in the same project context, not a claim of verbatim recovery of an unavailable original Part One.

Part One is now restored as a copy-ready section. I recovered the original opening from your saved PDF and clearly marked the additional material as reconstructed. Next, I can do the same for Part Two, using the recovered methodology and disclosure section rather than inventing an original text.

PART II — IMPARTIAL AI METHODOLOGY AND DISCLOSURE READ THE RECORD. FOLLOW THE EVIDENCE. DO NOT ERASE THE HUMAN BEING

Section 7 — I AM NOT ASKING YOU TO BELIEVE ME BLINDLY

I am not asking you to believe everything I say. I am asking you to examine what I have documented.

If I am wrong, identify the document that proves it.

If my disclosures were properly dealt with, show the record of how they were received, assessed and answered.

If legal assistance was properly refused or unavailable, show the reasons and the applicable review process.

If my account of institutional treatment is mistaken, identify the evidence that establishes the contrary.

Do not dismiss the record because it is uncomfortable. Do not accept every allegation merely because it is forcefully expressed. Read the documents. Follow the dates.

Compare the correspondence. Examine what each record actually says, what it does not say, and what remains unanswered.

READ THE RECORD.

My archive exists to make that examination possible.

Start with the Barran Dodger documentary archive, consult the official documents index, and follow the chronology. The GitHub repository preserves source files and supporting material for readers who want to inspect the record beyond the public- facing summaries.

Section 8 — THE METHOD: NEVER TURN AN ALLEGATION INTO A FACT

The archive must distinguish between different kinds of evidence.

A judicial or official determination records what a competent decision-maker actually decided, within the scope of that decision.

A primary government record establishes what the document records, who issued it, its date, and the matter it addresses. It does not automatically establish every interpretation later attached to it.

Contemporaneous correspondence and logs can help establish the sequence of communications, what was requested, what was answered and what appears to have remained unresolved.

Secondary compilations and AI-assisted analysis can organise large collections, identify patterns, compare propositions and direct readers towards relevant sources.

They remain analytical tools, not substitutes for the underlying evidence.

My testimony records my own account, experience, recollection, interpretation and understanding of events. It must be read as testimony, not mislabelled as an independent finding.

My faith and spiritual writing also form part of my personal record. They explain how I understand suffering, survival, forgiveness and purpose. They are not offered as substitutes for documentary proof of disputed external events.

These distinctions do not silence me. They make the archive easier to scrutinise, challenge, correct and understand.

Section 9 — THE ABSOLUTE RULE: DO NOT INVENT WHAT THE RECORD DOES NOT ESTABLISH

No document should be invented. No quotation should be manufactured. No person should be assigned a statement they did not make. No legal outcome should be claimed unless the relevant record supports it. No statistic, financial figure, causal connection, corroboration or finding should be represented as verified when it is not.

Where the evidence is incomplete, say so.

Where a proposition is disputed, identify it as disputed.

Where a conclusion is my interpretation, identify it as my interpretation.

Where an AI system has produced a summary or suggested a possible relationship, return to the underlying documents before treating that suggestion as reliable.

Where a source is unavailable, a link is broken, a date is uncertain or a document has been truncated, disclose the limitation rather than quietly filling the gap.

The appropriate labels include: DOCUMENTED: the identified source records the stated information.

TESTIMONY: this is my account of what I experienced or understood.

ALLEGATION: a claim has been made but is not established by the material cited.

ANALYSIS: an interpretation or comparison drawn from available material.

UNRESOLVED: the available record does not settle the question.

UNVERIFIED: the claim or detail has not yet been independently confirmed.

REQUIRES SOURCE: additional documentary support is needed.

These labels are not a mechanism for making my testimony disappear. They are a way of making the record more precise and allowing readers to see exactly what is being asserted.

Section 10 — WHAT THE DOCUMENTS CAN AND CANNOT SHOW

An official letter can establish that a communication was issued. It may record a referral, refusal, decision, acknowledgement or stated reason. It does not necessarily establish that every underlying allegation was investigated or resolved.

A refusal to investigate is not automatically proof that the allegation is true. Equally, a procedural refusal does not automatically answer the underlying factual question.

A referral is not necessarily a resolution. A complaint closure is not necessarily a determination of every event described in the complaint. A lack of response does not establish agreement, guilt or admission. It leaves the recipient's position unknown unless another record explains it.

The same discipline must apply to my own conclusions. If I identify an apparent contradiction, readers should examine the documents side by side. There may be an explanation. There may be a gap. There may be a genuine inconsistency. The correct response is to identify the records and examine the difference, not to invent an answer in advance.

That is why the archive includes both source material and interpretive writing.

The Federal Court, DSS and Comcare evidence page brings together records relevant to the employment-status and compensation questions I have raised. The Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter dated 3 June 2021, and the Administrative Appeals Tribunal decision dated 12 July 2023 should be read in their own terms and in context.

These are examples of why source-linked examination matters: readers can see what the documents say rather than being required to rely on my summary alone.

Section 11 — AI IS A RESEARCH ASSISTANT, NOT A SUBSTITUTE FOR EVIDENCE

Artificial intelligence can help organise a large archive, locate repeated names, compare dates, build indexes, summarise long documents and identify questions that deserve closer examination.

It can also make mistakes.

An AI-generated conclusion is not automatically correct because it sounds confident, appears impartial or has been repeated by another system. AI cannot transform an unsupported allegation into a proven fact merely by restating it in polished language.

For that reason, the archive should be read through its sources. Each important claim should be traced back to the document that supports it. Each apparent contradiction should be checked against the complete records where available. Each financial estimate should expose its assumptions and avoid double-counting. Each claim of corroboration should identify what independently supports it.

The purpose of using AI is to make a large body of material more navigable and testable —not to manufacture certainty.

I want scrutiny that is rigorous enough to find mistakes in my own work as well as mistakes in the records I am examining. Corrections should be transparent. Uncertainty should be acknowledged. Evidence should not be altered to make a preferred narrative easier to defend.

Section 12 — THE PUBLIC-COST QUESTION MUST ALSO BE TESTED

My archive raises questions about the human and administrative consequences of prolonged disputes, repeated correspondence, referrals, reviews and unresolved processes.

Those questions can include the time spent by public officials, the cost of repeated administrative activity, the expense of legal processes and the personal consequences of prolonged uncertainty.

But a financial scenario is not a verified expenditure total.

Any estimate must state its assumptions, identify its sources, distinguish actual recorded expenditure from hypothetical costs and avoid counting the same activity more than once. A possible cost is not proof that the amount was spent. A high estimate is not proof of wrongdoing. A low estimate does not erase the human consequences.

The objective is transparent accounting: identify what can be calculated, explain what cannot yet be calculated, and make the underlying assumptions available for examination.

Section 13 — THE HUMAN BEING MUST NOT DISAPPEAR INSIDE THE METHODOLOGY

There is a danger in any large administrative record: the paperwork becomes more visible than the person whose life is affected by it.

I am not a spreadsheet. I am not a complaint number, an email thread, a referral, a diagnostic label or a file in a government system.

I am a human being who has spent years trying to preserve documents, explain my circumstances and obtain answers to questions that I believe remain important. My testimony describes serious personal hardship, isolation, financial insecurity and the struggle to continue advocating for myself. Those experiences are part of the human context in which the records must be read.

Acknowledging that context does not require readers to accept every disputed interpretation. It requires them to recognise that administrative processes have consequences for real people.

If a recipient can help with an immediate humanitarian need, I ask that the need be considered on its own merits. Practical assistance with safety, accommodation, food, communications, disability support or access to independent advice should not depend on a person first proving every historical allegation.

The urgent human need and the longer documentary questions can be addressed in parallel.

Section 14 — WHAT I AM ASKING OF THE READER

I ask you to do five things.

First, read the primary documents rather than relying solely on summaries.

Second, distinguish what the sources establish from what I allege, infer or interpret.

Third, identify any material inconsistency, missing record or unsupported conclusion, and explain it with reference to the evidence.

Fourth, acknowledge the human consequences described in my testimony and consider whether practical help is possible now.

Fifth, preserve the record and share the relevant source links with people who may be able to examine it responsibly.

You do not have to accept every conclusion to help a person in distress. You do not have to decide every disputed question before reading a document. You do not have to treat silence as an answer.

You can begin by opening the archive.

You can begin by reading one letter.

You can begin by asking what happened next, what was recorded, what remains unresolved and what practical help is available.

Section 15 — THE RECORD IS OPEN

I am not asking for blind belief. I am asking for attention, accuracy, humanity and a willingness to examine the documents.

If the evidence supports my interpretation, explain how. If it does not, show where it fails. If the record is incomplete, identify what is missing. If the question falls outside your responsibility, say so plainly and, where possible, identify the appropriate route.

Do not confuse the absence of a final answer with the absence of a question.

Do not confuse the publication of an allegation with proof of that allegation.

And do not confuse a careful evidentiary method with indifference to the person whose life is recorded in the evidence.

The archive is a finding aid — not a court, not a verdict.

The witness remains. The record remains. The questions remain.

Read the documents. Follow the dates. Examine the evidence. Remember the human being.

PART III — THE PUBLIC COST OF INSTITUTIONAL TARGETING, SILENCING AND ERASURE FORMAL REPORT: THE DOCUMENTARY RECORD, THE HUMAN COST AND THE QUESTIONS THAT REMAIN

Section 16 — WHY THIS RECORD MATTERS

This is not simply a collection of complaints. It is an attempt to preserve a chronology of correspondence, administrative decisions, referrals, personal testimony and supporting documents so that the questions I have raised can be examined in context.

For decades, I have attempted to communicate my circumstances, raise concerns, seek assistance and obtain meaningful answers. I have preserved documents because I do not want the history of those attempts to depend solely on my memory or on a summary written by somebody else.

The archive brings together my testimony and the records I have collected. It allows readers to move between the broad account and individual documents, check dates, compare statements and identify matters that remain unresolved.

The archive does not claim that every allegation has been established. It does not claim that every official decision was improper, that every referral was unjustified or that every institution acted with a common purpose. Those propositions must be assessed against the relevant evidence.

My central contention is that the chronology deserves to be examined as a whole. A series of individual letters may appear routine when each is viewed in isolation. Their wider significance can only be assessed by considering what was asked, what was answered, what was referred elsewhere and what remained outstanding.

The question is not whether a large archive automatically proves every conclusion. The question is what the underlying records establish—and what they leave unanswered.

Start with the main Barran Dodger archive, the official documents index, the timeline and the source repository on GitHub.

Section 17 — THE CHRONOLOGY: WHAT WAS REPORTED, WHAT WAS RECORDED, WHAT HAPPENED NEXT?

A documentary chronology should answer several basic questions.

What did I report, and when?

Which person or institution received the communication?

What documents accompanied it?

Was the communication acknowledged, assessed, referred, declined or otherwise answered?

What reasons were given?

Was a further review or response available?

Which questions were resolved, and which remained unanswered?

What practical consequences did I report during the process?

The sequence matters because an individual response does not necessarily explain the entire history. A referral may identify another organisation as the appropriate recipient without resolving the substance of the original concern. A procedural decision may explain why a particular process did not proceed without determining every underlying factual allegation.

The archive contains correspondence that I consider important to this chronology.

Readers should examine each document in its full context rather than treating a short description as a substitute for the source.

For example: Letter to the Prime Minister, 31 May 2022 Read the original PDF Prime Minister's Office response, 12 December 2022 Read the archived response Attorney-General's Department correspondence, 19 September 2023, reference MC23-028244 Read the original PDF Attorney-General's Department correspondence, 6 February 2025, reference MC25-000321 Read the original PDF These links are starting points for documentary examination. Their inclusion does not, by itself, prove misconduct or establish the truth of every interpretation I have drawn.

Their importance lies in allowing readers to examine what was actually recorded, what the correspondence addressed and how it fits into the broader chronology.

Section 18 — THE EMPLOYMENT AND COMPENSATION QUESTIONS

One important strand of the archive concerns my attempts to clarify employment status, workers' compensation and the administrative treatment of my claim.

The records should be read together, while keeping the scope of each decision distinct.

Comcare determination, 26 May 2021 Read the determination Comcare claim record, 25 May 2021 Read the claim record NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter, 3 June 2021 Read the letter Administrative Appeals Tribunal decision, 12 July 2023 Read the decision Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023, concerning Dr Richard William McLean Read the archived PDF I consider the relationship between these records significant to my account of employment status, responsibility and compensation. I ask readers to examine the actual wording, dates, legal context and scope of each document before reaching conclusions about how the records relate to one another.

The existence of different statements or administrative outcomes does not automatically establish a legal contradiction. It does, however, make it important to identify precisely what each document decided, what question it addressed and whether any issue remained outside its scope.

My concern is that the practical consequences of unresolved status and responsibility questions can be substantial for an individual who is already struggling to obtain assistance and representation.

The documentary task is to identify the relevant facts, establish what the records actually say, and determine which questions remain open—not to replace that task with an unsupported conclusion.

Section 19 — OVERSIGHT, COMPLAINTS AND REFERRALS

Another strand concerns my efforts to raise issues through oversight and complaint processes.

The archive includes records relating to the Commonwealth Ombudsman, Victorian oversight processes, the Australian Human Rights Commission and other institutions.

Each record must be read according to its own purpose and jurisdiction.

Examples include: Commonwealth Ombudsman — PID notification concerning non-allocation Read the archived document Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction, 8 August 2025 Read the archived letter IBAC outcome letter, 9 April 2020 Read the archived letter IBAC PID response, 18 November 2021 Read the archived response Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision, 14 June 2022 1.

Read the archived decision These records do not all answer the same question. A decision about whether a body will allocate, accept or continue a matter should not automatically be described as a factual determination of every allegation contained in the original complaint.

My concern is that the cumulative administrative experience has left me with significant unanswered questions. I ask readers to assess that concern through the chronology, not through assumption.

Where a complaint was declined, identify the stated reason. Where jurisdiction was limited, identify the limit. Where a matter was referred, establish what was referred and whether the recipient responded. Where a process ended without addressing a particular factual issue, identify that distinction accurately.

That is how a referral trail becomes a useful research record rather than merely a list of agency names.

Section 20 — THE HUMAN COST CANNOT BE MEASURED ONLY IN ADMINISTRATIVE OUTPUT

An administrative file may record that a letter was sent, a complaint was closed, a decision was issued or a matter was referred. Those events can be counted. The effect on the person involved is harder to quantify.

My testimony describes prolonged hardship, social isolation, financial insecurity, difficulties obtaining effective assistance and serious effects on my life. I have also described repeated psychiatric hospitalisations and periods of housing insecurity.

These are statements about my reported experience and should be read alongside any relevant supporting records available in the archive.

I do not believe the human consequences should be dismissed simply because they cannot all be converted into a precise dollar figure.

At the same time, a report about public costs must not present speculative calculations as audited expenditure. If a cost estimate is used, its assumptions should be visible.

The calculation should distinguish actual expenditure from hypothetical scenarios, identify its sources and avoid counting the same activity twice.

The public-cost question is therefore twofold: What costs can be established from reliable financial or administrative records?

2. What human consequences are described in the testimony and supported by the available evidence?

Those questions are related, but they are not interchangeable. A documented administrative cost does not measure the full personal impact. A serious personal impact does not, by itself, prove a particular public expenditure or establish legal liability.

Both deserve careful consideration.

Section 21 — WHY PRESERVATION MATTERS

I have preserved documents because a record can become difficult to reconstruct when websites change, files move, links fail or older material is no longer readily accessible.

The archive is intended to make source material easier to locate and compare. The repository preserves files and supporting material; the public-facing website provides navigation and context.

The archive also includes analytical writing and personal testimony. Those materials serve a different purpose from the primary documents. They help explain why I consider particular records important, but they should not be mistaken for independent findings.

Where hashes or timestamps are supplied, their significance must be described precisely. A cryptographic hash can help identify a particular digital file. A timestamp may help establish that a particular file or hash existed by a recorded time, depending on the timestamp system and verification status. Neither mechanism independently proves that the contents of a document are true.

The same care applies to archive counts. Different snapshots may contain different numbers of files, PDFs or indexed records. Counts should be dated and tied to the particular inventory from which they were derived. They should not be combined as if they all described one verified collection at one moment.

This is why the archive should be treated as a developing finding aid. Readers should follow the source links, check the available files and distinguish the preservation of a record from proof of the claims recorded inside it.

Section 22 — WHAT I WANT INVESTIGATORS, JOURNALISTS AND RESEARCHERS TO DO

I invite independent researchers, journalists, disability advocates, legal and administrative researchers, public-interest organisations and others with relevant expertise to examine the record.

I ask them to: Identify the primary documents most relevant to each issue.

Construct a chronology that includes both supportive and contradictory material.

Verify names, dates, references and quotations against original sources.

Distinguish the fact that a complaint was made from the truth of the complaint.

Distinguish an agency’s procedural decision from any substantive finding it actually made.

Identify missing documents and explain why they matter.

Test financial estimates against reliable records and transparent assumptions.

Correct errors openly rather than repeating them.

Consider the practical needs of the person whose circumstances are being documented.

I do not ask researchers to adopt a predetermined conclusion. I ask them not to begin with one either.

The purpose of making this record public is to allow its contents to be examined, challenged and understood without requiring readers to rely exclusively on my account.

Section 23 — A DIRECT CHALLENGE TO THE READER

I am not asking you to accept every allegation.

I am asking you to look at the documents.

If my chronology contains an error, identify the date and source. If I have misunderstood a decision, quote the relevant passage and explain it. If a record contradicts my interpretation, place the contradiction beside the claim. If a matter has been resolved, identify the decision that resolves it. If a question remains unanswered, state exactly what information is missing.

Do not turn a suspicion into a finding. Do not turn a procedural outcome into a finding it never made. Do not treat the absence of a finding as proof that the event occurred—or as proof that it did not occur.

And do not let those distinctions become an excuse to ignore the human being who has asked for help.

The purpose of this report is to preserve the questions, make the sources accessible and encourage careful examination of the evidence and the consequences described in my testimony.

Section 24 — THE RECORD REMAINS OPEN

I have assembled this archive because I want the documentary record to survive beyond any single complaint, conversation, website or institutional process.

I want readers to be able to find the correspondence, trace the chronology, understand the methodology and distinguish my personal testimony from the primary records.

I want errors to be correctable, uncertainty to be visible and evidence to remain accessible.

Above all, I want the person behind the documents to remain visible.

The archive is a finding aid — not a court, not a verdict.

The testimony is mine. The documents must speak for themselves. The questions should be examined, not erased.

PART IV — THEY COULD NOT ERASE WHAT GOD PRESERVED

Safeguarding, Documentary Evidence, Administrative Exclusion, Faith and the Survival of a Witness

Section 25 — I am still here. The record is still here.

I am still here.

I am still speaking.

I am still preserving the record.

After decades of correspondence, complaints, administrative processes, disputed classifications, unanswered questions and personal hardship, I refuse to accept that the survival of a human being can be treated as an inconvenience to be managed away.

My name is Dr Richard William McLean. I am also known publicly as Barran Dodger. My archive brings together official correspondence, government records, personal testimony, analytical reports and other material that I believe deserves serious examination.

The archive is not a court and does not claim to be a verdict. It is a finding aid: a means of preserving documents, following chronology, identifying contradictions and making questions visible that might otherwise remain scattered across separate institutions and years.

The central question is simple: what happens when a person continues to raise concerns, continues to preserve records, and continues to ask for answers, but experiences the cumulative consequences of unresolved disputes and repeated administrative processes?

That question deserves examination without prejudice. It should not be answered by assuming every allegation is true, nor by dismissing the entire record because some matters remain disputed or unresolved.

Read the documents. Follow the dates. Compare the explanations. Identify what is established, what is contested, what is missing and what still requires investigation.

The witness remains. The record remains. The questions remain.

Section 26 — The immediate safeguarding question

I have reported experiences and concerns that I want taken seriously, recorded accurately and assessed impartially. Those reports include concerns about my safety, the conduct of others, my accommodation and my ability to obtain a response that addresses the substance of what I have reported.

I do not ask a reader to assume that every interpretation I have made is necessarily correct. I ask that the reported events, their consequences, the available evidence and the practical safeguarding questions be considered separately and fairly.

Where I report something I have personally experienced, that is my testimony. Where I describe conduct by another person or organisation, that is an allegation unless independently established. Where I identify an official document, readers should examine the actual document and its context.

Those distinctions do not justify ignoring a safeguarding concern.

A person should be able to report fear, seek assistance, request that records be preserved and ask for an impartial assessment without having their report automatically treated as proof of wrongdoing—or automatically dismissed because the cause is disputed.

I have sought a documented, accountable response rather than confrontation.

My requests to Ablepoint have included preserving relevant records, accurately recording my complaints, clarifying whether authorised monitoring has occurred, identifying the evidentiary basis of serious allegations, protecting against retaliation and providing an appropriate independent avenue for safeguarding concerns.

These are requests for clarification and protection. They are not findings that the organisation or any particular individual has committed misconduct.

The original material is preserved within the master archive

https://github.com/wezzo72/Barrandodger/blob/main/MASTER-PART-04.html.txt

My position is that safeguarding must begin with an accurate record of what has been reported, an assessment proportionate to the circumstances, and practical steps to address immediate risks where those risks are identified.

Section 27 — The forensic archive: examining the record as a whole

The documentary archive exists because individual records can become difficult to understand when separated from their chronology and surrounding correspondence.

A letter may refer to an earlier complaint. A later decision may rely on an earlier classification. An institution may refer a matter elsewhere. A subsequent response may address jurisdiction without resolving the original substantive question.

Each step may have its own explanation. The question is whether the sequence, considered as a whole, reveals inconsistencies, gaps, duplicated processes or unresolved issues that merit further examination.

My archive seeks to make those relationships visible.

The collection includes official correspondence, administrative decisions, complaints, referrals, tribunal-related material, government responses and my own contemporaneous statements. The archive also contains analytical summaries intended to help readers navigate the material.

One AI-assisted synopsis describes a documentary corpus of 453 primary-source Australian Government records. Other archive materials refer to larger collections accumulated over many years. Those figures relate to particular descriptions or snapshots and should not automatically be combined into a single verified count.

The significance of the work is not the size of a number by itself. It is whether each cited document can be located, whether its provenance can be established, whether the chronology is accurate and whether the conclusions drawn from it follow from the evidence.

The full archive and analytical material are available here

Section 28 — Administrative invisibility: a hypothesis to test against the evidence

I have used the expression administrative invisibility to describe what I perceive as the cumulative effect of prolonged disputes, fragmented decision-making, repeated referrals and unresolved questions.

The expression is an analytical interpretation of my experience. It is not presented as proof of a literal secret instruction or a coordinated plan by every institution or official involved.

The question is whether a pattern can emerge when separate decisions and processes are examined together over time.

Did one institution’s classification influence another institution’s response? Were relevant documents available to later decision-makers? Were earlier questions actually answered, or was responsibility redirected? Did the process resolve the underlying issue, or did it generate another process? What practical consequences followed for my financial security, housing, professional identity, personal relationships and access to assistance?

These questions can be examined through chronology and source comparison.

The analysis must also allow for alternative explanations. Different institutions may have different statutory responsibilities. Records may be incomplete. Officials may reach different conclusions because they apply different legal tests. A repeated outcome does not, by itself, establish shared intention.

But those qualifications do not make the pattern irrelevant.

The proper task is to test the pattern against the documents, not to assume either a conspiracy or an innocent explanation before the records have been examined.

The relevant material is collected in the archive's methods and institutional sections: Methods and the architecture of erasure Named institutions register Official documents index

Section 29 — The employment and compensation questions

Among the issues I have asked readers to examine is the documentary history surrounding my claimed employment relationship, the Comcare process and subsequent administrative and tribunal-related records.

The archive contains a Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, a claim record dated 25 May 2021, a letter from the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission dated 3 June 2021, and a later tribunal decision dated 12 July 2023.

These records should be read individually and in chronological order. Their legal significance depends on their complete wording, the applicable legislation, the issues actually decided and any relevant later developments.

The existence of different descriptions or decisions does not, without further analysis, establish that a particular institution acted unlawfully. It can, however, identify a concrete question for examination: what employment status or relationship was asserted, what evidence was considered, what legal test was applied, and how did the reasoning in one record relate to the reasoning in another?

The source documents are available here: Comcare determination — 26 May 2021 Comcare claim record — 25 May 2021 NDIS Commission letter — 3 June 2021 ART decision — 12 July 2023 Federal Court, DSS and Comcare documentary section I want the underlying employment and compensation questions examined against the actual records and relevant law. I want any material inconsistency identified precisely. I want any potential entitlement assessed on its merits rather than replaced by speculation, assumption or a calculation unsupported by the evidence.

That is a request for substantive examination, not a claim that the existence of these documents automatically proves liability or establishes a particular compensation amount.

Section 30 — The human cost cannot be reduced to a file number Behind every administrative record is a human being.

For me, the consequences I describe are not merely theoretical. My testimony concerns prolonged distress, loss and instability, financial hardship, isolation, damage to my sense of security and the struggle to maintain a public record of matters I believe remain unresolved.

I have described my experience through the language of survival, betrayal, poverty, isolation and erasure. Those words convey the gravity with which I understand my own life. They are part of my testimony, and they should be read in that context.

An archive can preserve a letter. It cannot, by itself, provide accommodation, food, safety, a functioning telephone, human companionship or a reliable source of practical assistance.

Nor can a documentary collection, however extensive, substitute for the immediate needs of a person who is struggling to remain safe and stable.

That is why this appeal asks for more than readers, views or online attention.

I ask people who are able to help to consider practical assistance, appropriate safeguarding support, independent examination of the records and connections to organisations capable of responding constructively.

I ask journalists and researchers to approach the evidence with care. I ask advocates to recognise the human being behind the paperwork. I ask those who disagree with my interpretations not to confuse disagreement with a reason to disregard every underlying document.

Preserving evidence matters. Protecting human dignity matters too. Neither should be sacrificed to the other.

Section 31 — They Could Not Erase What God Preserved

My Christian faith is central to how I understand my survival.

I have interpreted my experiences through the language of witness, endurance, resurrection, divine purpose and the conviction that truth should not be abandoned simply because its testimony becomes uncomfortable to hear.

The title They Could Not Erase What God Preserved expresses that conviction.

It is a theological testimony, not a claim that supernatural causation has been empirically established. My faith gives meaning to my experience and informs my determination to continue speaking. Readers do not need to share every element of my interpretation to understand the human significance of survival, memory and the preservation of testimony.

The work asks what it means to continue after apparent defeat; to preserve a record after feeling unheard; to retain a sense of identity after years of conflict; and to believe that a person’s worth cannot be measured solely by institutional decisions or public recognition.

The testimony moves from suffering to endurance, from silence to declaration, and from the fear of erasure to the determination to preserve what remains.

The documentary archive and the theological testimony are related, but they serve different purposes. The documents can be checked against their sources. The spiritual meaning is my testimony of faith. Historical propositions should be assessed through relevant evidence, while theological convictions should be represented honestly as convictions of faith.

I will not pretend that faith is merely an administrative category. Nor do I ask that my faith be treated as a substitute for documentary evidence.

Both belong to the honest account of who I am and why I continue.

They could not erase what God preserved.

The title of this testimony expresses my belief that suffering does not have to be the final word, that survival can become a form of witness, and that preserving the record can be an act of hope.

Section 32 — What I ask of the public

I ask readers to take five practical steps.

First: read the source material. Do not rely solely on a headline, a summary or a description of what a document supposedly says. Open the linked record and read it in context.

Second: follow the chronology. Compare the dates, the questions raised, the responses given and the issues that remained unresolved.

Third: preserve the distinction between evidence and interpretation. Identify what an official record expressly states, what I report as personal testimony, what is alleged, what is inferred and what remains uncertain.

Fourth: offer practical assistance where possible. If you are connected to a relevant humanitarian, disability, housing, safeguarding, legal-support, whistleblower-support or public-interest organisation, consider whether you can provide a referral or make a responsible introduction.

Fifth: share the archive responsibly. Link to the original sources rather than presenting disputed allegations as established findings. Preserve context and avoid exposing private information unnecessarily.

The archive is available here: Open the Barran Dodger documentary archive Open the permanent evidence mirror Read the complete-site timeline Read the master humanitarian appeal

Section 33 — A direct appeal for human contact and support

I am asking for a response that recognises both the documentary record and the human being who has assembled it.

I do not want my entire existence reduced to an argument about paperwork. I do not want my requests for help to disappear into another referral without anyone addressing the practical question of what assistance is available.

I want meaningful human contact. I want people to read the material, tell me what they can realistically do, and help connect me with appropriate support.

If you cannot investigate the archive, perhaps you can help locate someone who can. If you cannot provide financial assistance, perhaps you can make a referral to a suitable service. If you are a researcher, perhaps you can identify a specific document that deserves closer scrutiny. If you are a journalist, perhaps you can begin by asking what the records establish and what remains unanswered.

If you are a member of a faith community, perhaps you can offer compassionate contact without requiring me to surrender my voice or my testimony.

Please do not promise what you cannot deliver. Please do not make assumptions about matters you have not examined. But if you can help, please respond clearly and humanely.

I am asking people not to confuse the complexity of a long documentary history with the absence of a human need in the present.

Section 34 — Final declaration: the record remains open

I have preserved this material because I believe the questions it raises matter.

I have sought to organise documents, establish chronology, identify inconsistencies and make the archive accessible to people who may be willing to examine it. I have used analytical tools to assist with that work, while recognising that summaries must remain accountable to their sources and that AI-generated analysis is not an independent legal or investigative finding.

I have recorded my testimony because I do not want the personal consequences of this history to disappear behind administrative language.

I have expressed my faith because it is part of my understanding of survival and purpose.

I am asking for practical help because a person can preserve thousands of pages and still need another human being to answer the phone, make a referral, provide support or listen.

The archive does not ask readers to accept every conclusion without scrutiny. It asks them not to dismiss the evidence without reading it.

The testimony does not demand that every reader share my faith. It asks that the spiritual meaning I attach to survival be understood as part of my own account.

The appeal does not require anyone to resolve decades of questions in a single response. It asks for the next responsible step: examine a source, answer a specific question, preserve relevant evidence, make an appropriate referral or offer practical assistance.

I remain committed to preserving the record and asking questions that I believe deserve answers.

The archive is a finding aid, not a court and not a verdict.

The allegations remain distinguishable from established findings. The analytical interpretations remain open to testing. The underlying documents remain available for examination.

And the human being remains present behind the record.

I am still here. I am still speaking. I am still asking for help.

The witness remains. The record remains. The questions remain.

PART V — THE PERSONAL APPEAL: I AM STILL HERE, AND I AM ASKING FOR HELP

A first-person testimony of survival, faith, preservation and human dignity

Section 35 — This is not only an archive. It is a human life.

I am not simply a collection of documents.

I am not a file number, a disputed classification, a case reference or a problem to be transferred from one office to another.

I am a human being who has spent years trying to preserve a record of experiences, decisions, correspondence and unresolved questions that I believe deserve serious attention.

I am Dr Richard William McLean, known publicly as Barran Dodger.

I have continued publishing because I believe the documentary record should remain accessible and because I do not want my testimony to disappear.

But the work of preserving evidence does not remove the need for human assistance.

Maintaining an archive does not provide a roof, food, reliable communication, financial security or companionship. Publishing documents does not automatically connect a person with someone willing to listen or help.

That is why this is a personal appeal.

I am asking people to see the human being behind the archive.

I am asking for practical assistance, compassionate contact, responsible referrals and an honest engagement with the material I have preserved.

Please do not merely count the pages. Recognise the person who has been trying to keep the record alive.

Section 36 — Why I continue to publish

I continue because I believe that records matter.

I continue because chronology matters.

I continue because a document should be read in context and because a person’s account should not be reduced to a label before the underlying material has been considered.

My archive brings together official correspondence, administrative decisions, personal testimony, analytical summaries and other documentary material. Some matters are documented by official records. Some are my own account of events. Some are allegations or interpretations that remain open to examination.

I do not ask readers to erase those distinctions. I ask them to use those distinctions properly.

I want people to follow the sources, compare the dates, examine the reasoning and identify what remains unanswered.

The archive is intended to make that work possible.

Master humanitarian appeal

Section 37 — The personal cost of survival

I have described my life through the language of betrayal, exile, isolation, poverty, institutional abandonment and survival.

Those words express my experience and how I understand the cumulative consequences of what I have lived through.

I have felt stripped of security, support and belonging. I have struggled to obtain answers to questions that I believe matter. I have continued to document my concerns while dealing with the personal consequences of prolonged uncertainty and hardship.

I am not asking anyone to pretend that every disputed matter has already been resolved. I am asking that the human cost of living through unresolved matters be recognised in its own right.

A person can have an extensive archive and still be in need.

A person can be articulate and still be vulnerable.

A person can challenge institutions and still need practical assistance.

A person can disagree with an official explanation without that disagreement, by itself, settling the underlying question either way.

My testimony is that I have continued to survive and speak despite circumstances I have experienced as profoundly damaging.

That survival is part of my story. It is not a substitute for examining the documents, and the documents do not erase the human reality of the story.

Section 38 — Betrayal, forgiveness and the God I came to know

The best thing I have come to understand about my survival is not that suffering was acceptable. It was not.

It is not that betrayal did not hurt. It did.

It is that, within my Christian faith, I have come to understand that even the most devastating experiences do not have to determine the final meaning of a life.

When the sources of security I relied upon seemed to disappear, I found myself asking what remained when status, recognition, professional credentials, family relationships and institutional responses could no longer provide the reassurance I needed.

My answer is God.

I do not offer that as a scientific conclusion or as a demand that every reader share my beliefs. I offer it as my personal testimony of faith.

I have come to understand survival as more than continuing to breathe. It means preserving the capacity to speak, to remember, to seek truth, to retain compassion and to refuse to let bitterness become the whole of one's identity.

I have also reflected on forgiveness.

Forgiveness does not mean that every action was acceptable. It does not mean that questions should never be asked, that evidence should be destroyed or that accountability is unnecessary. It means that I do not want hatred to become the purpose of my life.

I want the record examined. I want people to understand what I have reported. I want appropriate assistance and a fair consideration of the evidence.

And I want to remain capable of compassion.

Section 39 — They Could Not Erase What God Preserved

This is the spiritual conviction at the centre of my testimony.

I believe that my continued existence, my continuing voice and my determination to preserve the archive have meaning beyond the immediate circumstances in which I find myself.

The title They Could Not Erase What God Preserved expresses that belief.

It describes the movement from apparent defeat to continued witness; from silence to publication; from isolation to the decision to reach outward; and from the fear of being forgotten to the determination to leave a record that others can examine.

I understand this through biblical themes of endurance, suffering, preservation, hope and the possibility of renewal.

The spiritual meaning belongs to my faith and personal interpretation. The historical claims in my archive remain separately open to examination against their sources.

I do not need to turn faith into a substitute for evidence. Nor do I need to conceal my faith in order to explain why I continue.

My testimony is that I have survived, that I continue to believe in God, and that I remain committed to preserving the record.

I am still here. That is part of the testimony.

Section 40 — The archive needs preservation, but I need help too

I have appealed for help with the cost of maintaining and preserving the archive. Earlier versions of my appeal identified a target of US$250 for a month of hosting, timestamping and distribution. That is the amount stated in the original material, not a newly verified current hosting quote.

If financial support is possible, please use the published donation information and check the details before transferring funds.

If you cannot donate, sharing the appeal or connecting me with an appropriate support organisation may still help.

If you work in disability advocacy, humanitarian assistance, housing support, whistleblower support, journalism, research or a Christian community, I ask you to consider whether you can offer a useful introduction or referral.

If you are a researcher, you may be able to help by examining a specific source document, checking a chronology or identifying an unanswered question.

If you are simply someone who has read this appeal, a respectful human response is better than silence.

I do not want to promise that every contribution will resolve the circumstances I describe. I ask for help because practical assistance can make a real difference even when the larger documentary questions remain unresolved.

Section 41 — What I ask from those who read this

I ask you not to assume that you already know the whole story.

I ask you to read before deciding.

I ask you to distinguish the source document from the summary, the allegation from the finding, the personal testimony from the interpretation, and the question from the answer.

I ask you not to turn the existence of unresolved questions into an excuse for ignoring a person who needs help now.

I ask you not to promise assistance you cannot provide. A clear and honest response is more useful than an assurance that leads nowhere.

If you can offer practical support, please say what you can do.

If you cannot help directly, please consider whether you know a person or organisation that might be able to respond.

If you are concerned about a particular allegation, identify the document or claim and explain the concern specifically. That gives the question a chance to be examined rather than allowing the whole archive to be reduced to a general argument.

I am asking for engagement that is human, specific and responsible.

Section 42 — A final personal declaration

I have spent years preserving material that I believe should remain available for examination.

I have written, collected, organised and published because I do not want the record to disappear.

I have spoken about my suffering because silence is not the only possible response to hardship.

I have spoken about my faith because it is part of how I understand my life.

I have asked for help because no person should be expected to meet every practical need alone.

I remain willing to have the documents read, the chronology tested and the conclusions examined. I also remain entitled to describe my own experiences and the meaning I attach to survival.

I do not ask you to agree with every interpretation I have made.

I ask you to recognise that there is a person here, asking to be heard and asking for practical assistance.

The archive is a finding aid, not a court and not a verdict. It is an invitation to examine the record.

My faith is a testimony, not a demand that every reader share my beliefs.

My appeal is a request for human contact, practical help and responsible engagement.

I am still here.

The record remains.

And I am asking you not to look away.

PART VI — Personal Statement of Exile and Timeline

Personal Statement of Exile and Timeline I ask that this distinction be examined against the documentary record, including financial records, accommodation records, NDIS records, correspondence and other evidence contained in the archive.

ELECTRONIC HARASSMENT AND WHAT I REPORT AS V2K I report that I am electronically intercepted, harassed and surveilled with what I describe as unacknowledged V2K technology.

I describe this as a deliberate technique of torture manifesting as audio harassment, including what I report as 24-hour blasphemous slurs intended to attack my sense of self.

These are my reported experiences and allegations. I do not present the existence or mechanism of the technology as an independently established fact.

I ask that these reports be distinguished from psychiatric interpretations of them and, where possible, independently investigated rather than automatically treated as symptoms of mental illness.

MENTAL HEALTH TREATMENT AND THE CTO A mental-health Community Treatment Order mandates my forced medication as the panacea for my treatment while, as I allege, refusing to acknowledge the entire situation described in this statement and the circumstances that I say are contributing to my distress.

My concern is that the medication framework may address my reported distress without independently examining the circumstances I allege are causing or contributing to that distress.

I ask that this distinction be examined rather than assuming that every reported experience is explained by a psychiatric diagnosis.

NSW TRUSTEE AND GUARDIAN AND ACCESS TO JUSTICE I allege that NSW Trustee and Guardian are gatekeepers to what I describe as my financial destruction.

I further allege that financial administration and restrictions have actively contributed to circumstances in which access to legal assistance is effectively blocked, creating what I describe as a total legal-aid barrier and fundamentally restricting possible pathways to justice.

These are serious allegations.

I ask that they be assessed against the actual financial records, decisions, correspondence, applications for assistance, legal-aid responses and available review mechanisms rather than being accepted or rejected without examination.

Nothing below finds that a crime, conspiracy, or coordinated mandate occurred.

IMPARTIAL AI NARRATIVE — PERSONAL STATEMENT OF EXILE (23 SEPTEMBER 2026) This archive added a named first-person statement titled "PERSONAL STATEMENT OF EXILE, INSTITUTIONAL DETRIMENT AND THE SEARCH FOR PROTECTION. " The statement is published in full on its own tab, Personal Statement of Exile.

This note does not decide whether the account is true. It describes what the document says, how it sits next to material already on the site, and what a reader can test.

The statement is written in the first person. It presents the author as an unprotected whistleblower who describes himself as being in political exile inside the country of his citizenship. It locates the account in more than three decades of contact with government agencies, professional systems, health and disability services, legal institutions and oversight bodies.

The author states that he has placed the underlying material in a public archive so that allegations can be checked against documents rather than accepted because he makes them. The statement repeats that allegations are allegations unless independently established, and that the existence of a document does not by itself prove the alleged wrongdoing.

The list of alleged harms is cumulative: alleged institutional abandonment and failure of protection; financial restriction; barriers to legal representation; alleged forced dependency on accommodation from which the author says he has no practical means of escape; administrative processes that he believes have reduced his ability to advocate for himself; professional and social isolation; characterisation of complaints as mental illness rather than matters requiring investigation; reported electronic interception, surveillance or unexplained audio harassment including what he describes as V2K; threats and safety concerns; alleged mistreatment of companion and therapy dog Crystal; alleged coordinated reputational damage; and what he describes as political exile and displacement.

He alleges the combined effect has made independent legal, financial, medical, housing or media assistance extraordinarily difficult to obtain.

On accommodation he records that he has no lease to Able Point, and alleges that formal “free to leave” does not equal a realistic capacity to leave because he has no financial mechanism, no vehicle and nowhere practical to go.

On electronic harassment he reports experiences he describes as V2K and expressly does not present the existence or mechanism of that technology as an independently established fact.

On mental health he refers to a Community Treatment Order mandating forced medication and asks that reported distress not be treated as fully explained by diagnosis without examining the circumstances he alleges.

On finance he alleges NSW Trustee and Guardian restrictions have contributed to a total legal-aid barrier, and asks that this be assessed against financial records, decisions, correspondence and review mechanisms.

The statement points to the existing Crimes matrix (1–150) and the archive index.

A date of 23 September 2026 is the date this statement was added to the public HTML.

It is not, by itself, a new agency determination.

Presence of related files elsewhere in the archive shows documents were stored. It does not prove coordination, crime, or that every allegation is established.

This narrative does not find that Able Point, NSW Trustee and Guardian, any clinician, or any other named body committed an offence.

THE EARLIER TIMELINE AND THE EMAIL COMPILATION The earlier timeline on this site was a filter over filename-dated catalogue rows. That catalogue is still on the timeline page, underneath this narrative. It was not a chronology a reader could follow. This statement replaces that as the timeline tab. It does not delete the catalogue.

Read in order, the public index and this September 2026 email compilation show a long correspondence between one person and a series of agencies, then a concentrated burst of the author’s own emails in the first half of September 2026.

The agency filenames show that letters and determinations exist and are dated. They do not, by themselves, show that each decision was unlawful, coordinated, or aimed at erasure.

The September emails show what the author reported, to whom, and that he asked several recipients to preserve records and to separate his experience from a finding of fact. They do not show that the recipients agreed, investigated, or accepted the allegations.

Claims that reach further back — surveillance from at least 2002, a 2003 book, a 35- year span, fourteen psychiatric detentions, a clinical death in 2021, an assassination attempt — appear in the September emails as the author's account.

This timeline does not treat those as established events, because this compilation does not contain the primary record that would date them independently. They stay in the allegation column until a document on its face establishes them.

WHAT A READER CAN ACTUALLY DO WITH THIS ORDER Start with the filename-dated agency letters, in the order above, and read those PDFs.

Then read the September 2026 emails as a record of what was alleged afterwards and of how the author asked for the record to be preserved.

Keep three columns: What an agency document states on its face.

What the author reports experiencing.

What is still an unresolved question.

PART VII — THE OPENING STATEMENT

1. I am a human being, and this is the record I have preserved My name is Dr Richard William McLean. I publish under the name Barran Dodger. I am a person with a life, a history, professional work, relationships, faith, losses, testimony and a substantial body of documents that I have worked to preserve. I am not merely a file number, an administrative problem, a complaint lodged in the wrong place, a name appearing in a database, or a person to be dismissed without engaging with what he has actually submitted.

I have assembled the Barran Dodger archive because I believe that my experiences, the decisions affecting me, the correspondence I have received and the unanswered questions surrounding those decisions deserve to be preserved in a form that other people can examine. I have published documents, correspondence, personal testimony, chronologies, analytical essays, source indexes and allegations in order to keep the underlying record accessible.

The principal archive is available at Barran Dodger Archive. Its associated evidence mirror is available at GitHub Backup. The archive also contains a master humanitarian appeal, a timeline, a named-parties register, and the 1–150 allegation schedule.

These are not interchangeable documents. The timeline organises events and documentary leads. The named-parties register identifies institutions, people, professions and places that appear in the archive. The allegation schedule records claims and research questions. The individual letters show what their authors actually wrote. My personal testimony explains how I experienced and interpreted events. The analytical essays attempt to connect those materials.

The distinction matters because I want the record to be read carefully, not merely believed or dismissed. A reader should be able to move from a claim to the relevant document, from the document to its date and context, and from the context to the question that remains unresolved. If a letter records a refusal, the refusal should be examined. If it records a referral, the referral should be traced. If two institutions appear to have adopted inconsistent positions, the wording of both records should be compared. If I allege conduct that is not established by the documents currently linked, the allegation should remain identified as my allegation rather than being silently converted into a finding.

That approach does not require me to abandon my voice or withdraw the seriousness of what I have reported. It means that the archive can preserve my testimony in full while giving readers the tools to distinguish the source material from my interpretation of it.

2. Why I have preserved this material I have spent years trying to explain circumstances that I believe have caused serious and lasting detriment to my life. My account includes allegations concerning disability support, employment classification, workers' compensation, public-interest disclosures, access to legal assistance, police reporting, financial hardship, accommodation insecurity, family relationships, mental-health services, reputational harm and the responses of public institutions.

I have also described experiences of threats, harassment, surveillance and intimidation.

Those descriptions are part of my testimony. Where I believe a particular person or organisation was responsible, that attribution must be examined against the actual source material and any available independent evidence. A document showing that I reported an event establishes that I made the report; it does not automatically establish every detail of the event. Equally, a record showing that a complaint was declined or referred does not automatically resolve the truth of the underlying allegation.

My reason for publishing is that the documents should remain available for readers to inspect. The archive is intended to preserve the difference between what I said, what an institution recorded, what an institution decided, what another institution later said, and what still needs to be explained.

The archive's official-document index provides a route into the correspondence. The Federal Court and AAT pathway brings together material associated with the public- interest-disclosure and employment questions. The personal statement of exile preserves my first-person account. The allegation schedule records the broader categories of alleged detriment and questions requiring examination.

I ask readers not to confuse the size of an archive with proof of every proposition in it.

The value of the archive lies in making its underlying sources accessible and in showing how the different parts of the record relate to one another. Each document should be read for its own contents, provenance, date, author, recipient, scope and outcome.

3. The three central issues The current Master Humanitarian Appeal begins by identifying three issues at the front of the record: corruption concerns, administration of official responsibilities, and harm to people.

Corruption concerns I have raised concerns that I believe warrant examination against the documentary record. The word corruption is serious. Its appearance in my testimony or in an essay is not, by itself, proof that a crime has occurred. The appropriate documentary question is what specific conduct is alleged, which record bears on it, who made the relevant decision, what evidence supports or contradicts the allegation, and whether an official response addresses the substance of the concern.

The Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023 is a key record in this context because it contains language about the information supplied in a public-interest- disclosure process and records a decision concerning allocation of the disclosure. Its wording should be read in full and in context. It must not be transformed into a judicial finding that every allegation in my archive was proved.

Administration of official responsibilities My archive raises questions about how various applications, complaints, disclosures, referrals, information-access requests and compensation matters were handled. Those questions can be examined by comparing the actual letters and decisions.

The 19 September 2023 Attorney-General's Department letter, reference MC23-028244 is one example of a document relevant to the referral pathway. The 12 December 2022 Prime Minister's Office response is another relevant record because the archive describes it as stating that an email had not been forwarded. Each letter must be understood in its own context. A referral proves a referral was recorded; it does not prove the recipient investigated. A statement that an email was not forwarded establishes that particular response; it does not, by itself, establish why or whether another process occurred.

Harm to people I have described the consequences of the circumstances I report, including financial insecurity, difficulties obtaining assistance, accommodation problems, loss of support and the burden of repeatedly documenting my experiences. Those consequences are central to my humanitarian appeal. They should not be reduced to a procedural dispute or treated as unimportant merely because separate institutions have addressed separate parts of the record.

My testimony and the documents concerning my circumstances should be read together. Where a record directly establishes an event, it should be cited. Where I describe an experience that has not been independently established by the documents available here, it should be identified as my account. Where a causal connection remains disputed or unproven, the essay should explain the question rather than pretend that the answer has already been established.

The purpose of these distinctions is not to diminish the testimony. It is to make the documentary record clearer, stronger and more useful.

Section 43 — The reader's task: follow the link, read the source, examine the question I ask every reader to approach this archive in a practical way.

Begin with the original document rather than relying exclusively on a headline, filename or summary. Establish who wrote it, to whom it was addressed, when it was dated, what matter it considered and what it actually concluded. Compare it with related records. If an institution refers a matter elsewhere, look for a record from the receiving institution before assuming that an investigation took place. If a letter deals with one legal test, do not automatically treat it as deciding a different legal question.

The archive's named-parties register is a finding aid, not a list of proven offenders. The 150-item allegation schedule is a record of allegations and research questions, not 150 established crimes. The archive's own data file states that the allegation matrix has 150 entries and "NONE DECLARED" for findings. The status of an entry is therefore not upgraded merely because it has been numbered, repeated in an essay or included in an AI-generated analysis.

The schedule uses evidence labels including A, B, C, D and H. These labels are not a substitute for reading the documents. The schedule describes A as relating to a primary document, B as incomplete, C as requiring corroboration, D as narrative, and H as high- consequence, with an express warning not to treat H as established. Those labels help communicate the state of the material; they do not constitute a judicial determination.

The archive also contains a timeline whose data note says that dates may have been taken from filenames or earlier catalogue listings and that a filename date is not necessarily a verified event date. That qualification must be retained wherever the timeline is used. A filename can guide a search, but it cannot independently prove the date on which the underlying event occurred.

The purpose of the essay is to bring these sources together in readable narrative paragraphs without erasing their differences. The evidence links should sit beside the claims they illuminate, so readers can move directly from a term such as public-interest disclosure, employment classification, service restriction, referral, workers' compensation, access to justice or accommodation insecurity to the record that makes the term relevant.

5. The documentary preservation project The archive is also a preservation project. It brings together website pages, PDFs, correspondence, author-written essays, evidence indexes, chronology data and digital copies hosted in public repositories. The main website is the presentation and navigation layer; the Backup repository contains a separate collection of public evidence documents.

The archive's Phase 2 inventory, generated 19 September 2026, records that the public evidence mirror then contained 545 document blobs, including 531 PDFs. It identifies 169 filenames or paths with official-looking titles, 41 author-publication titles, 18 sensitive-title matches and several groups requiring duplicate review. These are catalogue counts from that phase, not a fresh independent verification of every file's contents or authenticity. The inventory explicitly states that the PDF bytes had not been independently hashed during that phase and that the existence of a blockchain manifest should not be treated as proof of every document's contents.

That qualification is important to the archive's credibility. A catalogue can establish what has been counted and where a file is listed. A cryptographic hash can help identify a particular digital file. A timestamp can help establish that a particular file existed in a particular form by a particular time, subject to the details of the timestamp record.

None of those technical mechanisms independently establishes that every statement in a document is true, that a document's interpretation is correct, or that a named person committed an offence.

The archive's preservation purpose is nevertheless substantial. Keeping copies available, providing stable source links, recording catalogue limitations and identifying the documents still needing review can make the material easier to examine and less dependent on any single website or presentation page.

PART VIII — THE KEY DOCUMENTS AND WHY THEY MATTER

6. The 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister The 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister is a key starting point because it records a communication I sent to the highest level of the Commonwealth executive. It provides a dated source for examining what I put before the Prime Minister's office and how I framed my concerns at that time.

The importance of this letter is not that an appeal to a senior office automatically proves the allegations it contains. Its importance is that it establishes a specific documentary event: a communication was prepared and preserved, and the reader can inspect the actual text rather than depend on my later recollection alone.

The correct questions are what matters the letter raised, which supporting records it referred to, what response followed and whether the later correspondence addressed the substantive matters or only the handling of the communication. These questions can be examined against the 12 December 2022 Prime Minister's Office response.

7. The 12 December 2022 response: "Your email has not been forwarded" The archive identifies the 12 December 2022 response with the statement that the email had not been forwarded. That short statement matters because it records a particular answer about the handling of my communication.

The significance lies in the difference between submitting information, having it forwarded, having it considered by another office, and receiving a substantive response to the issues raised. Those are distinct steps. The record supports the statement about forwarding that it actually contains; it should not be used to invent a motive or to claim that no other process could possibly have occurred.

The document should be read beside the original letter. That pairing allows a reader to assess the original communication and the subsequent response together. It also makes it possible to identify what the response did and did not answer, without overstating what a short administrative letter can establish.

8. The Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023 The Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023 is one of the most important documents in the archive's public-interest-disclosure and employment-related chronology. It should be read in full rather than reduced to one quoted sentence.

The archive quotes the assessment as stating: "On the information you have provided me, I am satisfied that you are, or were, an employee with the Department of Social Services, providing services under the trading name Rich McLean, Arts Life Coach, Peer-Support Worker & Mental Health Advocate. " The exact wording and surrounding context should be checked against the original PDF.

The phrase "on the information you have provided me" is material: it tells the reader that the assessment was made on the information supplied to its author. It is relevant to the employment-status question, but it should not be represented as deciding every issue about employment, statutory coverage, compensation entitlement, alleged retaliation or the truth of every allegation in the archive.

The assessment also records a decision not to allocate the disclosure under the PID process. Its significance is that it places an employment-related statement and a disclosure-handling decision within the same administrative record. A careful reader should examine how the assessment explains the applicable process, what it says the disclosure tended to show, and why the decision-maker reached the recorded outcome.

The document is not a judicial judgment merely because it is associated with the Federal Court. The correct description is the administrative assessment preserved by the archive. Its wording may be significant, but the scope of what it establishes must remain tied to the document itself.

9. The letter to Sia Lagos dated 3 March 2023 The 3 March 2023 letter addressed to Sia Lagos, CEO and Principal Registrar of the Federal Court is another key source. A longer copy is also published, and the archive's Sia Lagos tab provides related navigation.

The significance of the letter is that it preserves what I communicated to the Federal Court's administrative leadership. It allows readers to inspect the concerns as I presented them, the language I used and the documentary issues I asked the recipient to consider.

The letter must be distinguished from the subsequent assessment. One is my correspondence; the other is an institutional response. They have different authors, functions and evidentiary status. Reading them together makes it possible to identify the matters I raised, the matters the assessment addressed and the questions that remain open.

10. The Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021 The Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021 is central to the workers' compensation pathway. The associated Comcare claim record dated 25 May 2021 provides a related source, and the 12 July 2023 tribunal decision records a later stage in the review pathway.

The significance of these records is that they permit the claim, the determination and the later review to be considered as separate but related events. The reader should identify the statutory question Comcare addressed, the reasoning it recorded, the evidence it considered and the actual outcome of any review. A determination about statutory eligibility or employee status does not automatically resolve every separate question about a relationship with DSS or about the handling of a public-interest disclosure.

My concern is that the different employment-related records should be read together rather than treated as isolated statements. Whether the documents are consistent, whether they apply the same legal test and whether a particular finding has consequences for another process are questions requiring careful comparison. The essay should identify those questions without asserting that one document necessarily determines an issue it did not decide.

11. The 12 July 2023 AAT/ART decision The decision dated 12 July 2023 in McLean and Comcare belongs beside the initial Comcare records because it provides a distinct source for the review process.

Its significance is that a reader can examine the review body's actual reasoning and orders rather than relying solely on either my account or the initial determination. The decision must be quoted and characterised according to what it decided. It should not be described as resolving unrelated allegations, nor should a procedural document from an earlier stage be mistaken for the final outcome.

The 25 January 2022 AAT prehearing record is also listed in the archive. It should be treated as a separate procedural record, useful for reconstructing the sequence of the case but not interchangeable with the later decision.

12. The NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter dated 3 June 2021 The archive links the 3 June 2021 NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter, which is titled as a "not an employee" record.

Its significance is that it preserves the Commission's stated position in a particular process. That position must be understood in the context of the question the Commission was addressing. It should not automatically be treated as deciding whether I had an employment relationship with every other entity, whether a different statutory test applied, or whether Comcare or the Federal Court assessment reached the same conclusion.

This is precisely why the archive needs cross-referenced narrative rather than isolated bullet points. A reader should be able to compare the Commission's letter, the Comcare determination, the tribunal decision and the Federal Court assessment, while keeping each document's author, date, legal context and scope intact.

13. The Attorney-General's Department letter dated 19 September 2023 The 19 September 2023 Attorney-General's Department letter, reference MC23-028244 is significant because the archive identifies it as a referral-related record involving the Security Law Section and directions toward other oversight pathways.

The reader should examine the original letter for its precise wording, the subject of the correspondence, the bodies named and the limits of what was being referred. A referral may show that a department identified another body as a potential recipient or avenue.

It does not by itself prove that the receiving body accepted the matter, conducted an investigation, agreed with the allegations or reached a substantive conclusion.

The related 6 February 2025 Attorney-General's Department correspondence provides another dated source for the chronology. These records should be compared without assuming that they concern exactly the same question or that the later letter automatically resolves the earlier one.

14. The Commonwealth Ombudsman records The archive includes a Commonwealth Ombudsman PID non-allocation record and identifies a service-restriction letter dated 8 August 2025.

These are separate administrative records. The PID-related document concerns the handling of a disclosure; the service-restriction letter concerns the later conditions under which correspondence or service was handled. Their significance lies in what each says, when it says it, and what reasons or scope are recorded.

Neither record should be used as a shortcut to determine the truth of every underlying allegation. A decision not to allocate a disclosure is not automatically a finding that the disclosure was false. A service restriction is not automatically proof that an institution accepted or rejected the substance of every earlier complaint. The reader must inspect the stated reasons and any procedural information in the original documents.

The key documentary question is whether the records explain the matters raised and the process applied, and whether any important issue remains unanswered by the correspondence itself.

15. The Law Enforcement Conduct Commission letter dated 19 November 2025 The archive identifies a Law Enforcement Conduct Commission letter dated 19 November 2025, reference CASE202512395/13KM, in the government evidence folder.

The extracted letter is described in the archive as stating that the correspondence did not concern NSW Police or NSW Crime Commission officers and was therefore outside that Commission's jurisdiction. The original record should be checked for exact wording before any extended quotation is used.

The significance of a jurisdictional response is that it records the institution's stated view about whether the matter falls within its remit. That is not the same as a factual determination that the reported events did or did not happen. Nor does it establish whether another body separately considered the allegations. The document must be represented for what it says: a particular response concerning jurisdiction.

16. IBAC and Victorian Ombudsman records The archive includes an IBAC outcome letter dated 9 April 2020, an IBAC PID response dated 18 November 2021, and a 2023 IBAC case record.

These documents must be treated as separate events. The dates, reference numbers, subjects and outcomes need to be taken from each source. A response to a public- interest disclosure is not necessarily the same as an outcome letter for another complaint. A case reference does not, by itself, show that every allegation in a wider archive was investigated.

The archive also identifies a Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision dated 14 June 2022.

That record concerns an information-access process. Its significance is that it can establish the basis on which the request was handled, the reasons given and any review rights recorded in the letter. It should not be treated as a determination of the substantive allegations for which the author sought information.

Section 44 — The Disability Royal Commission submission The archive preserves a Disability Royal Commission submission identified as SUB00101440.

Its significance is that it documents a submission made in the context of a national inquiry into disability-related matters. The submission is evidence of the material presented in that document, to the extent its contents and provenance establish that fact. It is not automatically evidence that the Commission adopted the author's claims or made an individual finding about them.

The reader should inspect the submission's date, contents, subject and any acknowledgment or response included in the file. Those details establish what the submission was intended to communicate and what further documentary trail, if any, is available.

Section 45 — The AHRC contact record The archive links an Australian Human Rights Commission contact record dated 4 July 2023.

The significance of this source is that it provides a dated record associated with a human-rights contact pathway. The exact letter must be read to establish whether it acknowledges contact, explains a process, describes jurisdiction, declines to proceed or records another step. A contact record is not automatically an investigation or a merits finding.

The archive should preserve both the fact of the communication and the precise institutional response, without overstating what either proves. That allows the reader to assess the gap, if any, between the assistance sought and the response received.

Section 46 — The Legal Aid NSW guardianship letter The archive identifies a Legal Aid NSW advice letter dated 14 January 2026 concerning guardianship.

The letter matters because it is a specific source concerning legal assistance in the guardianship pathway. Its significance should be drawn from the actual advice and the circumstances it describes. It is not itself a tribunal order, and it should not be described as a blanket denial of all legal assistance unless its text clearly supports that characterisation.

The related institutional pathway includes the NSW Civil and Administrative Tribunal and NSW Trustee & Guardian. Those links provide institutional context; the actual decisions and correspondence in my case must still be identified from the archive. The essay should distinguish advice, a tribunal proceeding, financial-administration decisions and my personal account of their consequences.

20. Why these documents must be read together These documents are important because they are not all about the same question. Some concern the handling of public-interest disclosures. Some concern employment classification and compensation. Others concern referrals, information access, complaint outcomes, disability-related processes, guardianship or human-rights contact.

The central documentary task is to establish what each record actually says and how the records relate. If two records use different descriptions of employment, the difference should be documented and the legal questions compared. If one body refers a matter to another, the receiving body's response should be sought rather than presumed. If a complaint is declined on jurisdictional grounds, that should be distinguished from a determination on the truth of the underlying allegations. If a letter addresses only a procedural issue, it should not be described as having resolved substantive issues outside its scope.

That is why I ask readers to follow the links and read the sources. The record should be evaluated through the documents themselves, not through an assumption that every claim is true, nor through an assumption that a refusal or non-allocation has disposed of every question raised.

The next part of this master will retain the original 150-item schedule in its published order and turn each entry into a narrative paragraph with a link to the relevant source where the archive supplies one. The missing number 84 will remain explicitly missing, as it is in the published Part II schedule. The separate 71-entry named-parties register will remain a separate register rather than being merged into the 150 allegations.

THE BARRAN DODGER MASTER HUMANITARIAN AND DOCUMENTARY ESSAY —

CONTINUATION Part Three — The allegation schedule: reading the entries as a connected record The published allegation schedule must be read alongside the underlying documents, the chronology, and the named-parties register. Its purpose is to make the claims and their documentary references easier to investigate—not to turn an allegation into an established finding merely by publishing it. The evidence should be assessed entry by entry, with the original source preserved wherever possible.

The full published schedule: Open the allegation schedule in the Barran Dodger archive.

The connected records: Official-document index · Timeline · Named institutions and parties · Methods and the “Architecture of Erasure”.

The schedule’s significance lies not simply in the seriousness of the allegations, but in the questions that can be tested against the documentary trail: what was reported, which body received it, what response followed, what reason was given, whether another body subsequently addressed the same issue, and whether the resulting records leave an unresolved contradiction or gap. A useful reading therefore distinguishes the original allegation, the evidence cited in support, the response from the named body, and the question that remains open.

The source must remain the authority for the wording and order of each entry. In particular, number 84 is missing from the published numbering. It must remain identified as a gap unless the original material establishes what belongs there. No paragraph should be invented to fill it, and no one should silently renumber the entries in a way that makes the archive harder to audit.

The published schedule also uses evidence labels. Those labels should be read according to the archive’s own definitions, rather than treated as interchangeable with a court finding, criminal conviction, or final determination. Where a record documents that a complaint was made, that is evidence of the complaint and its handling; it does not by itself prove every underlying allegation. Equally, a rejection, referral, non- allocation, or jurisdictional response should be described for what it says, without pretending that it necessarily answers every substantive question raised by the original material.

Schedule entries 1–15: human-rights concerns, safety, family violence, and early-life harm

Entry 1 — Refusal to report human-rights abuses. This allegation concerns whether information describing possible human-rights abuses was received by people or institutions with the capacity to refer, document, or respond to it, and whether the response was adequate. The central documentary question is what was communicated, to whom, on what date, and what response—if any—followed. The reader should compare correspondence and complaint records rather than assume that a failure to act has already been established. Its wider significance is that a record of repeated referrals can help distinguish an isolated administrative omission from a recurring pattern of non-response. The archive's starting point is its official-document index.

Entry 2 — Alleged protection of, or failure to act against, a named private person. The archive identifies this as a serious allegation, marked D/H in the schedule. The question is whether there is documentary evidence that a person was reported, that another party knew of the report, and that a relevant response was withheld or inadequate. The label H signals high consequence, not proof. Any assessment must distinguish the conduct alleged against the private individual from the separate question of what others knew or did. The relevant names and institutional references should be followed through the named-parties register, without treating inclusion in that register as a finding of wrongdoing.

Entry 3 — Forced homelessness. This entry concerns the allegation that circumstances beyond the author's control contributed to the loss of secure accommodation. Its importance is not limited to the fact of being without a home: accommodation insecurity can affect physical safety, access to a telephone, the ability to preserve records, attendance at appointments, and continuity of disability or other support. The documentary inquiry should establish the sequence of accommodation changes, any notices or decisions, the assistance requested, and what was offered or refused. The archive's account of displacement should be read alongside its personal statement of exile and conditions section.

Entry 4 — Prolonged exposure to family violence. This entry records the author's allegation of sustained exposure to family violence. The relevant questions include what events were described, whether assistance or protection was requested, whether contemporaneous records exist, and what happened after disclosure. A narrative account may establish what the author says was experienced and reported; corroborating records may help establish dates, contacts, injuries, or the actions taken by others. The absence of a particular record should not be silently transformed into proof that an event did not occur, nor should an allegation alone be represented as a final determination. The related archive section is family complicity.

Entry 5 — Refusal to report alleged police corruption. This entry raises two distinct issues: the underlying allegation of police corruption and the alleged failure of a recipient to report or refer it. Those issues require separate examination. A reader should identify the original complaint, the recipient, any jurisdictional explanation, and any referral or decision that followed. A body saying that a matter falls outside its remit is not necessarily deciding whether the alleged conduct occurred; it is describing the limits of its own role. The archive's timeline and official-document index provide starting points for following those records.

Entry 6 — Blacklisting and ministerial assistance. The schedule records an allegation involving blacklisting and the seeking of ministerial assistance. To investigate this claim carefully, the record must distinguish a documented request for assistance from evidence that a blacklist existed, that a decision-maker relied on it, or that a particular action resulted from it. Relevant material may include correspondence, employment or service decisions, reasons given by an organisation, and records of representations to ministers. The significance of this entry lies in whether the chronology reveals an identifiable decision, its stated rationale, and any evidence that the author's prior disclosures or circumstances affected the outcome. The government evidence folder is one place to look for relevant official records.

Entry 7 — Unfair financial rulings. This allegation concerns the fairness and consequences of financial decisions. The word unfair expresses the author's challenge to those decisions; it does not itself identify which legal test was applied or establish that a decision was unlawful. The documentary task is to compare the decision, the evidence available to the decision-maker, the reasons recorded, any review or appeal, and the practical effect on the author. Financial rulings can have consequences well beyond an account balance, particularly where debt, housing, support services, or the capacity to pursue other claims is involved. Relevant records include the archive's Comcare determination of 26 May 2021 and the AAT/ART decision of 12 July 2023, each of which must be read for its actual findings and scope.

Entry 8 — Rejection of public-interest disclosures. This entry concerns disclosures the author considers to have been rejected or mishandled. It is important to identify whether each communication was treated as a public-interest disclosure, a complaint, a request for information, or correspondence outside the receiving body's jurisdiction.

The classification affects the response a body says it can provide, but the label used by an institution does not by itself resolve every issue raised by the underlying communication. The archive's PID records and its records concerning the Commonwealth Ombudsman's PID non-allocation are relevant to this inquiry. Each response should be quoted or paraphrased accurately and distinguished from any conclusion that has not been reached.

Entry 9 — Lack of support for essential services. This entry concerns the author's allegation that necessary assistance was not supplied or was insufficient. The significance of such a claim is practical and immediate: access to electricity, food, communication, safe accommodation, and disability support can determine whether a person can remain safe and engage with administrative processes. The evidence should identify the service requested, the date of the request, the person or body approached, the eligibility or funding explanation given, and the actual outcome. A written offer of limited assistance does not automatically mean that all needs were met; equally, an adverse response should be represented precisely. The archive's conditions section and humanitarian appeal set out the author's broader account of the human consequences.

Entry 10 — Ignoring cognitive brain impairment. The schedule raises the allegation that cognitive impairment was not adequately recognised or accommodated. The documentary inquiry should separate evidence of a diagnosis or assessment from evidence that a particular decision-maker knew of it, was given relevant information, and then failed to take it into account. It should also ask whether communication, decision-making, support, or review arrangements were adapted to the circumstances described. This issue matters because an administrative process may be formally available while being practically difficult to navigate without appropriate assistance.

The guardianship and legal-aid advice record dated 14 January 2026 is a relevant document to examine for its precise subject matter and advice, without assuming it proves every aspect of this allegation.

Entry 11 — Condoning violent attacks. This allegation asks whether reported violence was ignored, excused, or inadequately addressed by people or institutions in a position to respond. The word condoning is a serious characterisation and needs to be supported by the actual sequence of reporting and response. The reader should look for any incident report, police statement, medical or support record, correspondence, or explanation given by a recipient. The author's police statement dated 14 August 2022 is one identifiable record in the archive; its contents should be read directly rather than inferred from its title. The broader issue is whether the documented response addressed the particular risks reported.

Entry 12 — Untreated ADHD leading to addictions. This entry links the author's account of untreated ADHD with later addiction-related harm. That causal relationship should be presented as the author's claim unless the supporting clinical records establish it more specifically. A careful review would distinguish evidence of ADHD, the availability or absence of treatment, the circumstances in which substance use or other addictive behaviour developed, and the author's account of the relationship between those experiences. The issue has significance for continuity of care and whether support addressed the person's needs over time. It should not be used to stigmatise the author or reduce the broader documentary record to a diagnosis.

Entry 13 — Advocacy for ineffective solutions. This entry concerns the allegation that assistance or intervention promoted solutions that did not adequately address the author's circumstances. Its significance depends on identifying what was proposed, by whom, for what stated purpose, and with what practical result. A recommendation can be well-intentioned yet unsuitable; alternatively, the evidence may support the author's contention that repeated recommendations failed to address known barriers. The record should show the difference between an option being offered, an option being accessible, and an option actually resolving the problem. This entry should therefore be connected to dated correspondence and outcomes wherever those records exist, rather than treated as a general conclusion about everyone who offered assistance.

Entry 14 — Childhood sexual abuse. This is a high-consequence personal allegation, marked D/A and H in the schedule. It should be treated with seriousness, dignity, and care. The author's testimony is part of the preserved record; any contemporaneous disclosures, clinical records, correspondence, or other corroborating material should be described according to what they actually establish. A later document recording that an account was given can establish that the disclosure was made at that time, even where it does not independently establish every detail of the underlying event. The archive must neither sensationalise the allegation nor imply that the absence of a particular form of documentation settles the question. This entry is also part of the author's wider account of vulnerability, safety, and the long-term effects of experiences reported from childhood.

Entry 15 — Drugging and rape. This entry records an allegation of sexual violence involving drugging, marked H in the schedule. It is essential to distinguish the allegation itself, any account given to police or support providers, any medical or other records, and any independent finding—if one exists. The existence of an allegation does not establish a criminal finding; equally, a lack of an identified finding in the archive does not justify rewriting the author's testimony as though it had never been made. The entry's significance includes the need to preserve any available source material accurately, avoid unnecessary repetition of intimate details, and keep the chronology clear. The archive should link only to genuine, verified records relevant to this entry and should not imply that unrelated documents corroborate it.

Schedule entries 16–30: surveillance allegations, displacement, compensation, and access to redress that he was under investigation in his home environment. The essential questions are what form of investigation was suspected or documented, what conduct gave rise to the concern, whether any official communication identified an investigation, and whether a reliable source confirms the nature and purpose of the activity. The distinction between documented contact with authorities and an inference about surveillance or investigation must remain visible. The allegation nevertheless belongs in the chronology because the author identifies it as part of the circumstances affecting his sense of safety and his ability to live securely. Relevant material should be linked to its original source rather than presented as proof of a particular investigative operation without that evidence.

Entry 17 — Chased out by police. This allegation concerns police conduct that the author says contributed to his departure from a location or loss of secure accommodation. A meaningful review requires the dates, location, officers or agency involved where identifiable, the stated reason for the police action, and any available incident or complaint records. A police interaction and its consequences are distinct questions: a record may establish that an interaction occurred without necessarily establishing every allegation about the officers' conduct or the reasons for leaving. The significance of the entry is the relationship between safety, police contact, and displacement. The archive's police statement of 14 August 2022 provides one documentary reference to examine, subject to its actual contents and relevance.

Entry 18 — Denial of owed settlements. This entry raises the author's claim that settlements or other payments due to him were not paid. The evidence should identify the source of each claimed entitlement, the relevant agreement or decision, the amount and due date if documented, any conditions attached to payment, and any explanation for non-payment. A claim that money is owed should not be conflated with a final determination of the amount recoverable. Equally, an administrative refusal or unresolved dispute should not be described as though it necessarily settles the underlying entitlement. This entry matters because disputed or unpaid sums may affect housing, access to representation, and the ability to maintain other claims. Any calculation of loss should be traceable to specific records rather than to a headline estimate alone.

Entry 19 — Non-payment of workers' compensation cases. The archive identifies a workers' compensation dispute supported by official records. The central documents include the Comcare claim record dated 25 May 2021, the Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, and the AAT/ART decision dated 12 July 2023. These records should be read in sequence. They can establish what claim was made, how Comcare treated it, and what the tribunal decided within the scope of its reasons. The author's wider contention about employment status and access to compensation must be assessed against those actual texts, not reduced to a claim that every aspect of the dispute was resolved by any single document.

Entry 20 — Malicious destruction of business. This entry alleges that conduct by others maliciously damaged or destroyed the author's business interests. The word maliciously implies intention and therefore requires particular care. The evidence should distinguish measurable business losses from the author's explanation of how those losses arose, and distinguish an adverse commercial outcome from evidence of deliberate interference. Relevant material might include business records, correspondence, contracts, records of access or ownership, and evidence of specific acts said to have caused the damage. The broader significance is the author's contention that professional and financial harm contributed to his subsequent vulnerability. Any financial assessment should identify the period, the underlying records, and the method used to calculate loss.

Entry 21 — Ban from AFCA. The schedule refers to the author's exclusion from, or restriction of access to, the Australian Financial Complaints Authority process. The documentary question is what decision or restriction was imposed, its stated basis, the scope of the restriction, and whether any review or alternative process was available. A restriction on using a complaint mechanism may have consequences for a person attempting to resolve financial disputes, but its meaning must be established from the actual letter or decision. The archive also contains an AFCA letter dated 21 May 2021 and an Ombudsman–AFCA referral-loop record. These should be read for what they say about the author's particular circumstances and the handling of his communications.

Entry 22 — Refusal by AHRC to investigate. This entry concerns the author's account of the Australian Human Rights Commission's handling of his approach. The archive includes an AHRC contact record dated 4 July 2023. The importance of that record depends on its contents: what matter was raised, what information was recorded, what explanation was given, and what procedural outcome followed. A contact record is not necessarily a full investigation file, and a decision not to investigate a particular matter does not automatically establish or disprove the underlying allegations. The author's concern is that the route to human-rights redress did not produce the examination or practical remedy he sought. That concern should be documented by setting out the actual correspondence and its consequences.

Entry 23 — Alleged unlawful removal from NDIS services. This entry concerns the author's allegation that he was removed from necessary National Disability Insurance Scheme services unlawfully or without adequate justification. The inquiry should distinguish a decision about eligibility or funding from a provider's decision about service delivery, and both from the question of whether the author was left without necessary support. The NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter dated 3 June 2021 records the Commission's position on the employment question addressed in that correspondence; it should not be represented as deciding every dispute involving the author and the NDIS. The key issue for this schedule entry is the documented sequence of service decisions, complaints, explanations, and practical outcomes.

Entry 24 — Neglect leading to suicidal tendencies. This entry describes the author's allegation that neglect and the absence of adequate assistance contributed to severe psychological distress and suicidal tendencies. It should be approached as a serious statement about harm, not as a rhetorical flourish. A documentary review can examine what distress was disclosed, who was informed, what support was requested, and how those requests were handled. Where health records exist, they should be described with appropriate care and only to the extent relevant. The entry also demonstrates why administrative records must be read in the context of a human life: a letter, referral, or closed file may have practical consequences for a person whose housing, safety, or access to support is already precarious. The archive's conditions section and humanitarian appeal provide context for the author's account of those consequences.

Entry 25 — Rejection of freedom-of-information requests and public-interest disclosures. This entry brings together two processes that should still be examined separately: requests for government information and disclosures raising concerns about possible wrongdoing. An FOI decision may turn on statutory grounds, exemptions, scope, or the records located; a public-interest disclosure process may involve different legal criteria and responsibilities. The archive records both as part of a broader experience of seeking answers. The evidence should show the request or disclosure, the receiving body's response, the reason given, any review or appeal, and what information was ultimately released. The archive's government evidence folder and PID files provide starting points for this comparison.

Entry 26 — Unsuccessful international appeals. The schedule records the author's account of appeals beyond domestic institutions. The documentary significance lies in identifying each organisation contacted, the issue submitted, the date, any reference number, and the response received—or the absence of a response where that can be demonstrated. Contacting an international body does not itself mean that the body accepted jurisdiction, investigated the facts, or reached a conclusion on the allegations.

Nor does an inability to obtain assistance from one channel answer every question in the underlying record. This entry belongs in the chronology because it documents the breadth of the author's attempts to find assistance and preserve his account. The archive should identify the recipient and actual correspondence for each approach rather than treating all international organisations as a single decision-making authority.

Entry 27 — Denial of family-violence specialist assistance. This entry concerns the author's allegation that specialist help was not made available when needed. The relevant questions are what assistance was requested, whether the request was directed to a specialist service, what eligibility or capacity explanation was given, and what alternative support—if any—was offered. It is important to distinguish an unavailable service, a refusal based on a stated criterion, and a failure to respond. Each may have different causes and consequences. The author's wider account is that inadequate access to assistance compounded other forms of vulnerability. The documentary record should make that practical effect visible without attributing motives to a service provider unless evidence supports that attribution.

Entry 28 — Denial of childhood redress. This entry concerns the author's contention that he did not receive the redress or remedy he sought in relation to childhood harm.

The record should identify the scheme or process approached, the nature of the application, any eligibility decision, and the reasons communicated. Different redress mechanisms have different scopes and requirements, so a refusal under one process should not be described as a determination of every allegation about the underlying events. At the same time, a record of an application and its outcome can be important evidence of the author’s attempt to obtain recognition or practical assistance. The archive should preserve the actual decision and the author’s response to it as separate parts of the documentary history.

Entry 29 — Refusal of emergency financial aid. This allegation concerns requests for urgent money or practical assistance that the author says were refused or inadequately met. The central issue is not simply whether a payment was made: it is what urgent need was communicated, what funds or services were sought, what criteria were applied, and whether the outcome addressed the immediate circumstances. The record should specify the date, amount where documented, recipient, response, and any alternative assistance offered. Emergency aid can be especially consequential where a person is also experiencing accommodation insecurity or difficulty accessing essential services. The archive’s humanitarian appeal explains the author’s stated need for practical support, while the underlying correspondence must establish the details of each particular request.

Entry 30 — Bankruptcy and debt accumulation. This entry identifies financial collapse and accumulating debt as part of the author’s account of harm. It is important to distinguish the existence and amount of debts from the author’s allegation about why they accumulated. A careful analysis would map the debts by date and source, identify any relevant judgments or formal insolvency records, and compare them with the income, expenses, disputed payments, and business losses the author describes.

Where the author attributes financial deterioration to institutional or individual conduct, that causal claim should be tested against the chronology and supporting material. The significance of the entry is cumulative: financial instability can restrict access to housing, transport, communication, legal assistance, and the capacity to keep pursuing unresolved matters. The archive should therefore connect the financial record to the wider timeline without assuming that every debt has a single cause.

End of this continuation. The next section should proceed with schedule entries 31–45 in the published order, retaining the source labels and explaining the significance of each entry without converting allegations into established findings.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 31–45: privacy, violence, reputational harm, and alleged coordinated conduct property was occupied unlawfully. The documentary inquiry should identify the property, the period of occupation, the basis on which the author claims a right to possession, and any correspondence, notices, police reports, tenancy documents, or court records concerning the situation. The term illegal occupation is the author’s characterisation of the alleged circumstances and should be connected to the specific evidence available. The wider significance is whether loss of control over property contributed to displacement, financial damage, or reduced personal safety. The chronology should show when the problem was first reported, what response followed, and whether the situation changed over time.

Entry 32 — Human-rights violations and character defamation. This entry brings together two serious but distinct concerns. The first is the author’s allegation that his rights were violated; the second is his claim that statements about him damaged his reputation. Each requires its own evidence. For the human-rights concern, the record should identify the conduct, the right said to have been affected, and the relevant circumstances. For defamation, it should identify the particular statement, its author or publisher where known, its audience, and the alleged reputational consequences. These issues should not be merged into one undifferentiated accusation. Their connection in the archive is the author's contention that reputational harm and adverse treatment compounded one another. Relevant material can be traced through the named-parties register and the official-document index.

Entry 33 — Financial impacts on accreditations and businesses. This entry concerns the author's allegation that financial circumstances or adverse events affected professional accreditation and business activity. The significance of the claim depends on a clear chronology: what accreditation or business interest existed, what changed, what explanation was given, and how the change affected income or professional opportunities. The archive should distinguish a documented loss of accreditation or business activity from the further claim that a particular person or institution caused it.

Financial records, business correspondence, accreditation decisions, and contemporaneous communications may help establish the sequence. This entry is important because professional and financial losses can reinforce each other, making recovery increasingly difficult when a person is already experiencing housing or support insecurity.

Entry 34 — Harassment and stalking. The schedule records allegations of harassment and stalking. These terms can cover different kinds of conduct, so the evidence should describe specific incidents rather than rely solely on the label. Relevant details may include dates, locations, communications, repeated unwanted contact, reports made, and any records identifying the conduct or the response. The reader should distinguish documented events from the author's interpretation of who was responsible or why the conduct occurred. Where the archive contains police or other official records, their contents should be represented accurately and in context. The significance of this entry is the author's account of persistent insecurity and its effect on his ability to live safely, maintain relationships, and continue documenting his circumstances.

Entry 35 — Violent crimes and property damage. This entry records allegations of violence and damage to property. The documentary task is to identify the incidents individually, including their dates, the property or person affected, any injuries or losses described, and the records created at the time. A police statement, photograph, medical record, repair invoice, or complaint may support different parts of the account; no single type of document necessarily proves every element of an allegation. It is also important to distinguish evidence that damage occurred from evidence identifying who caused it. The entry's broader significance is whether the author's account of physical insecurity and material loss can be followed through a consistent chronology of reported incidents and subsequent responses.

Entry 36 — Deception, vilification, and isolation. This entry concerns the author's allegation that deceptive or disparaging conduct damaged his standing and contributed to social isolation. Those are related but separate propositions: a statement may be demonstrably inaccurate without necessarily proving an intention to deceive, and isolation may have several contributing causes. The evidence should identify the communications or actions at issue, the people who received them where known, and the resulting changes in relationships or access to support. The author's testimony is important to understanding the lived consequences, while contemporaneous messages or correspondence may help clarify what was said and when. The wider concern is whether reputational damage, withdrawal of support, and other forms of exclusion interacted to deepen the author's vulnerability.

Entry 37 — Invasion of privacy. This entry raises the author's allegation that private information was accessed, used, disclosed, or otherwise handled improperly. A careful review should identify the information concerned, who is alleged to have accessed or disclosed it, the circumstances of the alleged access, and the evidence supporting that account. Privacy complaints and regulatory correspondence should be distinguished from findings that a particular person committed a breach. The archive contains a Micron21-related OAIC privacy record from March 2021, which should be read for its actual scope and outcome. The broader significance of this entry is the author's concern about control over personal information and the effect that uncertainty about privacy can have on safety and trust.

Entry 38 — Fraudulent activities without consequences. The schedule records an allegation of fraudulent activity and the author's view that those responsible did not face adequate consequences. Fraud is a specific and serious characterisation; it should not be inferred simply from a disputed transaction, an unsatisfactory service, or an adverse financial outcome. The documentary inquiry should identify the transaction or conduct, the evidence of alleged deception, the financial or other consequence, and any complaint or investigative response. If an authority declined to investigate or said that the matter fell outside its remit, that response should be recorded accurately without presenting it as proof either of fraud or of its absence. This entry's significance lies in whether the source material identifies a concrete suspected wrong and documents what happened after it was reported.

Entry 39 — Unexplained cessation of royalties. This entry concerns the author's allegation that royalty payments stopped without an adequate explanation. The relevant evidence may include publishing agreements, royalty statements, payment histories, correspondence with publishers or intermediaries, and any accounting explanations provided. The first task is to establish whether payments did cease, when the change occurred, and what contractual or accounting basis was given. The next is to examine the author's contention that the cessation was connected to other alleged events.

That causal link must be supported separately; a payment interruption alone does not establish deliberate interference. The entry matters because royalty income can be both a source of livelihood and a record of the author's professional work. Any claimed loss should be calculated from identifiable statements and contractual terms.

Entry 40 — Rejection of compensation claims. This entry concerns the author's account of compensation claims that were rejected or did not result in the remedy sought. It should be read alongside the underlying applications, the decision letters, and any subsequent review or tribunal decision. The fact that a claim was rejected is a documented procedural outcome where the decision is available; whether the rejection was wrong, unfair, or responsible for additional harm is a separate question requiring examination of the reasons and context. The archive's Comcare determination of 26 May 2021 and AAT/ART decision of 12 July 2023 are key records in the workers' compensation strand of the archive. They should be described according to their actual contents and limits.

Entry 41 — Government staff non-intervention. This entry alleges that government staff did not intervene when the author believes intervention was warranted. To assess the claim, the record must identify what information was provided, which office received it, what responsibility that office said it held, and what action or non-action is documented. A letter acknowledging receipt, a referral, a decision not to act, and silence are different outcomes and should not be treated as interchangeable. The archive includes a letter to the Prime Minister dated 31 May 2022 and a Prime Minister's Office response dated 12 December 2022. The latter is especially relevant to the author's account of attempted escalation because the archive describes it as stating that the email had not been forwarded. The exact wording and scope of that response should be checked in the original PDF.

Entry 42 — Drug-facilitated sexual assault. This entry records a high-consequence allegation of sexual assault involving drugs. It must be treated sensitively and without sensationalism. The record should distinguish the author's account of the incident, any disclosure made at the time, any medical or toxicological material if available, any police or support-service record, and any independent finding. Not every incident will generate every type of record, and the absence of a particular document should not be presented as a conclusive answer to what occurred. Equally, the archive should not claim that a document proves drugging or assault unless its contents support that specific proposition. The purpose of preservation is to keep the testimony and any associated evidence available for careful examination, not to overstate what any individual record establishes.

Entry 43 — Assault by contracted individuals. This entry concerns the author's allegation that people working under contract assaulted him. The inquiry should identify the alleged incidents, the roles of the individuals involved where known, the organisation or contract through which they were engaged, and any evidence of reporting or response. The fact that a person worked for a provider does not by itself establish that the provider authorised or knew about alleged conduct; organisational responsibility requires its own factual basis. Relevant records might include service agreements, incident reports, correspondence, witness accounts, and any complaints submitted to the provider or an oversight body. The wider significance is the relationship between personal safety and the responsibilities of organisations delivering services or engaging contractors.

Entry 44 — Theft. This entry records an allegation of theft. It should be investigated through specific items, property, funds, or other assets said to have been taken, along with the relevant dates, ownership or entitlement records, and evidence of what happened. A missing item or disputed transfer does not automatically establish theft or identify a perpetrator. Where police or other authorities were contacted, the archive should distinguish the report itself from any subsequent investigation or outcome. The purpose of this entry is to preserve the author’s account and any supporting records in a form that enables the claim to be understood in context. If the alleged loss is connected to accommodation, business, or service arrangements, those links should be explained only where the documentary chronology supports them.

Entry 45 — Participation in a conspiracy. This entry raises one of the broadest and most serious allegations in the schedule. The label H indicates high consequence; it does not establish that a conspiracy existed. To assess this hypothesis, a reader would need to identify the particular acts said to be connected, the people or organisations allegedly involved, the evidence of communication or coordination, and any plausible alternative explanations for the sequence of events. Similar outcomes or repeated administrative failures do not, on their own, prove a common plan. The archive’s value is that it preserves records from different stages and institutions so that the connections can be examined rather than assumed. Any claim of coordinated wrongdoing should therefore be presented as the author’s allegation or investigative hypothesis unless specific evidence supports a stronger description.

How to use these entries The schedule is most useful when each allegation is linked to a dated source, the source’s actual contents are described accurately, and any unanswered question is stated plainly. Its evidence labels should remain visible: A — primary document, according to the archive’s stated legend.

B — incomplete evidence.

C — corroboration needed.

D — narrative account.

H — high-consequence allegation; not an established finding.

These categories should not be silently upgraded. The archive's purpose is to preserve the record, show how the author's concerns developed, and make it easier to compare allegations with the documents that may support, qualify, or contradict them.

Next section: entries 46–60, continuing in the published schedule's order.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 46–60: employment, digital security, displacement, professional conduct, and alleged targeting that public statements damaged his reputation. The record should identify the words or substance of each statement, the person or organisation responsible where known, the audience, the date, and the harm the author says followed. Written publications, emails, public posts, and contemporaneous correspondence may establish what was communicated, while the question of legal defamation requires consideration of the applicable law and circumstances. The author's belief that statements were false or damaging should be preserved as part of his account, without implying that every disputed statement has been legally adjudicated. This entry matters because reputational harm can affect employment, relationships, access to services, and a person's ability to be heard when seeking assistance.

Entry 47 — Unlawful termination of employment. This entry records the author's allegation that employment was terminated unlawfully. The key evidence includes the nature of the employment relationship, any contract or engagement documentation, the decision to end the arrangement, the reasons communicated, and any review or legal proceedings. It is important to distinguish the end of an engagement from the separate question of whether the termination was unlawful or retaliatory. The archive also contains material concerning the author's employment status and workers' compensation, including the Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023 and the related essay about the Tredwell letter. Those documents should be described within their actual scope: an assessment based on information provided is not automatically a court judgment or a final determination of every employment issue.

Entry 48 — Government investigation harassment. This entry records the author’s allegation that government investigations or official processes became a source of harassment. The documentary inquiry should identify the investigation or process, the agency responsible, the communications received, the stated purpose, and the conduct the author experienced as harassing. An investigation taking place is not, by itself, proof of harassment; equally, an official label does not remove the need to examine how a process was conducted and what effects it had. The significance of the entry lies in whether the evidence identifies specific actions that were unnecessary, disproportionate, improperly communicated, or otherwise harmful. Each alleged incident should be tied to a dated record wherever possible, with the author’s interpretation clearly distinguished from the contents of official correspondence.

Entry 49 — Sexual assault by a service provider. This is a high-consequence allegation concerning a person or persons said to have been providing a service. The record should distinguish the author’s account of the alleged conduct from evidence identifying the service relationship, the date and circumstances, any disclosure or complaint, and any subsequent response. If a provider or oversight body received a report, its acknowledgment or decision can establish how the report was handled, but it should not automatically be described as proving or disproving the underlying allegation. The author’s testimony should be handled respectfully, with unnecessary intimate detail omitted from summaries while relevant original records remain identifiable. The wider issue is the safety of people who depend on service providers and the adequacy of procedures for receiving and responding to allegations of serious misconduct.

Entry 50 — Hacking incidents. This entry records the author's allegation of unauthorised access to digital accounts, devices, or information. A careful assessment should identify the account or system affected, the date and nature of the suspected access, any security alerts or provider correspondence, and whether technical evidence identifies a cause or actor. Unusual account behaviour or a suspected intrusion may warrant investigation, but does not alone establish who was responsible or whether the event was connected to other alleged conduct. The archive should preserve relevant digital records and distinguish technical observations from interpretations about motive or coordination. This entry is particularly significant to a documentary archive because its preservation depends on reliable access to files, accounts, and backups.

The security of the evidence itself is therefore a practical concern independent of whether any particular hacking allegation is established.

Entry 51 — Destruction of business and digital identity. This entry brings together the author's allegations of business damage and interference with his digital identity.

These issues should be analysed separately before any proposed connection between them is drawn. For the business, the relevant material may include financial records, correspondence, and evidence of lost activity. For digital identity, it may include account changes, access logs, domain or hosting records, and communications with service providers. The allegation that the same actor or plan caused both forms of harm requires its own supporting evidence. The significance is the possibility of cumulative consequences: loss of digital access can impair communication and business activity, while financial deterioration can make recovery and preservation more difficult. The archive should therefore record the sequence of events, the actual losses documented, and the uncertainties that remain.

Entry 52 — Coerced relocation under mental-health threat. This entry concerns the author's allegation that he felt compelled to relocate because of a threat or anticipated consequence involving mental-health intervention. The evidence should identify the statements or events that created the perceived pressure, who was involved, what options were available, and why the author considered relocation necessary. A person's account of feeling coerced is important testimony about the circumstances and perceived risks; determining what another person intended requires separate evidence.

The entry's significance lies in the intersection of accommodation, autonomy, mental- health processes, and personal safety. The archive's personal statement of exile provides context for the author's account of displacement. Any associated institutional records should be quoted accurately and not made to say more than their contents establish.

Entry 53 — Professional malpractice. This entry records the author's allegation of professional malpractice. The term can refer to different professional duties and legal standards, depending on the service and circumstances. The record should identify the professional role, the service provided, the conduct said to have fallen below the expected standard, the resulting harm, and any review or complaint response. An unsatisfactory outcome does not by itself establish malpractice, and an administrative complaint decision may address only a limited aspect of the matter. The archive should make clear whether a proposition comes from the author's narrative, an expert opinion, a contemporaneous record, or a formal finding. The broader significance is accountability for the quality of services on which a person may depend, especially where the person's ability to obtain an alternative service is limited.

Entry 54 — Conspiracy, second expression. The schedule includes a second entry describing conspiracy. Its appearance should be retained as part of the published source, but it should not automatically be treated as independent corroboration of the earlier conspiracy allegation. Repetition may reflect a different alleged incident, a later interpretation of events, or a duplicated theme in the matrix. The underlying material must establish which applies. The relevant task is to identify the specific conduct associated with this entry, the evidence said to connect participants, and whether the alleged acts are distinguishable from those covered by entry 45. Keeping these distinctions visible prevents the number of entries from being mistaken for the number of independently proven events. Any conclusion about coordinated conduct must rest on the underlying evidence, not the fact that the word appears more than once.

Entry 55 — Unjust targeting. This entry records the author's contention that he was singled out for adverse treatment. The question is whether the records identify particular decisions, actions, or patterns that treated him differently and what reasons were given. A comparison with similarly situated people may be relevant if reliable information is available, but the author's experience should not be dismissed simply because a comparison has not yet been established. The evidence should also distinguish an adverse outcome from evidence of selective treatment and distinguish selective treatment from proof of a particular motive. The significance of this entry is the author's claim that the events were not isolated inconveniences but formed a recurring pattern affecting his safety, finances, and access to assistance. The chronology and source documents are essential to testing that proposition.

Entry 56 — Political scapegoating. This entry raises the author's allegation that he was made a scapegoat in a political or public-administration context. Such a claim requires a clear explanation of the political or administrative issue involved, the conduct attributed to the author, the decisions made about him, and the evidence connecting those decisions to the alleged motive. The fact that an issue has political implications does not itself establish political targeting. The archive should preserve relevant public statements and correspondence, identify the chronology, and avoid attributing a coordinated motive without supporting evidence. The entry's significance is that it frames a question about the relationship between public-interest activity, institutional decisions, and the author's account of adverse consequences. Readers should be able to follow the documentary chain and decide which propositions are directly supported and which remain hypotheses.

Entry 57 — Assault resulting in hospitalisation. This entry concerns an alleged assault and the author's account that hospitalisation followed. The relevant evidence may include contemporaneous incident reports, medical records, discharge documentation, witness accounts, and any complaint or investigation. A hospital record may establish that treatment or admission occurred, while the cause of the injuries and the identity or conduct of another person may require additional evidence. The archive should distinguish these questions rather than assume that proof of hospitalisation independently proves every part of the alleged assault. The significance is both personal and chronological: a serious incident requiring hospital care may mark a turning point in the author's account of safety, support, or displacement. The underlying documents should be linked and dated so that the event can be examined in context.

Entry 58 — Forcible removal from home. This entry records an allegation that the author was removed from his home by force or under circumstances he experienced as coercive. The evidence should establish the location, date, people or agencies involved, the basis stated for the removal, and any available incident, tenancy, medical, or legal records. It is necessary to distinguish a documented relocation or removal from the further question of whether force was used unlawfully. The author's account of the experience should remain visible, while the documentary analysis should identify what each source independently establishes. The entry matters because removal from home can disrupt access to possessions, records, medication, communication, and ongoing support. Its relationship to the archive's broader account of homelessness should be shown through chronology rather than assumed solely from similar wording in different entries.

Entry 59 — Corruption within systems. This entry expresses a broad allegation that corruption occurred within one or more systems encountered by the author. Because the allegation is broad, it requires careful decomposition into specific events, decisions, people, and documentary evidence. An adverse decision, an apparent inconsistency, or a complaint that was not investigated does not by itself prove corruption. Relevant evidence might include official correspondence, records showing a departure from stated procedures, conflicting explanations, or material directly indicating improper conduct. The author's interpretation should be preserved as an allegation, with the supporting documents and unresolved questions made explicit. The significance of this entry is its proposed connection between individual events and wider institutional practices. That connection can only be assessed responsibly when the specific source records remain accessible and the distinctions between fact, inference, and hypothesis are maintained.

Entry 60 — Withholding of entitled financial assistance. This entry concerns the author's allegation that financial assistance to which he was entitled was withheld. The key questions are what entitlement is claimed, which rules or decision establish it, what payment or assistance was requested, and what reason was given for any refusal, delay, or reduction. It is important to distinguish a disputed entitlement from a confirmed one and to identify whether the issue involves eligibility, administrative delay, a funding limit, or another explanation. The practical consequences may nevertheless be substantial where essential expenses and accommodation are at stake. Any claimed arrears or loss should be calculated from the applicable decision and payment records, not inferred from the allegation alone. The archive's conditions section provides context for the author's account of financial insecurity, while the original financial correspondence is needed to establish the particulars of each claim.

Reading the pattern without overstating it Entries 46–60 move between alleged individual acts, professional and administrative decisions, and broader interpretations of repeated harm. Their common feature is the author's attempt to preserve a chronology and identify the consequences he attributes to the events.

That connection matters, but it should be demonstrated rather than presumed. A sequence of records can show that a complaint was made, a decision was issued, assistance was sought, or an adverse outcome followed. Whether the sequence also proves unlawful conduct, deliberate targeting, professional malpractice, or coordination depends on the content of the records and the evidence connecting them.

The archive should preserve both the force of the author's testimony and the reader's ability to examine the original sources independently.

Next: entries 61–75, continuing in the source's published order.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 61–75: political conduct, alleged persecution, threats, and barriers to reporting

Entry 61 — Failure to provide work-related compensation. This entry concerns the author's allegation that compensation associated with work-related circumstances was not provided. The central documents include the Comcare claim record dated 25 May 2021, the Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, and the AAT/ART decision dated 12 July 2023. These records need to be read together to understand the claim, the employment-status question, the reasons for the determination, and the tribunal's actual conclusions. The author's broader concern is that unresolved questions about the employment relationship affected access to compensation. The significance of this entry lies in the relationship between work, alleged injury or detriment, legal classification, and the practical consequences of a compensation refusal.

Entry 62 — Political corruption. This entry records a broad allegation of political corruption. It must be grounded in specific conduct, decisions, communications, or other evidence rather than inferred solely from a disappointing outcome or an unanswered request for help. The documentary task is to identify the political or public- administration actors involved, the particular decision or conduct being challenged, the author's evidence, and any response. A complaint about political conduct and a finding that corruption occurred are different things. The archive should preserve the author's allegation and make the supporting documents available so that readers can assess the basis for it. Its wider significance is the author's concern that political responsibility and administrative accountability were not adequately addressed through the channels he approached.

Entry 63 — Harassment with a sound-emitting device. This entry records the author's allegation that a sound-emitting device was used to harass him. The evidence should distinguish what he heard or experienced from any independently established information about the source, device, operator, or purpose. Relevant records might include dated notes, recordings, technical assessments, complaints, or correspondence describing the incidents. A sound or disturbance alone does not establish who caused it or whether it was deliberate, but the author's account should still be preserved accurately as testimony. The entry's significance is the reported effect on his sense of safety and the need to record recurring incidents in a form that permits comparison and investigation without prematurely asserting an unverified explanation.

Entry 64 — Targeted persecution leading to potential death. This high-consequence entry records the author's allegation that he was subjected to targeted persecution that placed him at risk of death. The wording expresses the gravity of his account, but does not itself establish a coordinated campaign or a proven intention to cause death. The documentary inquiry should identify the particular threats or incidents, the risk reported, the people or agencies notified, and any actions taken in response. The distinction between a person reporting that they fear for their life and independent evidence of another person’s intent must remain clear. The significance of this entry is that the archive treats the author’s stated safety concerns as central to the chronology rather than as incidental background. Any specific threat record should be linked directly and accurately.

Entry 65 — Cover-up of harm. This entry alleges that harm was concealed or inadequately acknowledged. To examine that claim, the reader must identify the harm at issue, what information was available to the relevant people or organisations, what was recorded or omitted, and whether the evidence indicates deliberate concealment or another explanation. An incomplete file, an unanswered complaint, or a decision not to investigate does not automatically establish a cover-up; direct evidence of concealment would carry different weight from a pattern of administrative silence. The author’s allegation should remain visible while the supporting records and unresolved questions are identified. The broader significance is the possibility that gaps in institutional records or explanations made it harder for the author to obtain a coherent account of what happened.

Entry 66 — Hospital avoidance of liability. This entry concerns the author’s allegation that a hospital or healthcare institution acted to avoid liability for harm. The documentary inquiry should identify the clinical or administrative event at issue, the response to any complaint, and the specific evidence said to indicate avoidance of responsibility. Clinical decisions, adverse outcomes, disagreements about care, and deliberate concealment are distinct matters and should not be treated as synonymous.

Relevant records may include medical correspondence, complaints, incident reports, and explanations provided by the institution. The entry’s significance is the author’s concern that his account of harm was not adequately addressed. The archive should preserve the correspondence and distinguish the institution’s stated position from the author’s interpretation of its actions.

Entry 67 — Failure to acknowledge financial obligations. This entry records the author’s allegation that financial obligations were not acknowledged or adequately addressed.

The first step is to identify the obligation claimed, the person or organisation said to owe it, the documentary basis for the claim, and the communications seeking acknowledgment or payment. An asserted debt, a disputed debt, and an established liability must be distinguished. If a written agreement, decision, invoice, royalty statement, or other record identifies an obligation, it should be linked directly. The significance of the entry is the practical effect that unresolved financial disputes can have on stability, housing, business activity, and the ability to pursue other remedies.

Any total claimed should be supported by an itemised calculation and the relevant underlying records.

Entry 68 — Threats of violence and extortion. This entry records allegations of threats and extortion. These are serious claims that should be documented through the exact words or conduct alleged, the date and circumstances, the identity of the person involved where reliably known, and any report made to police or another service. A threatening communication and a legally established offence are not the same thing; nor should a report be treated as proof of the identity or intention of the person responsible without supporting evidence. The archive should preserve original communications where available and avoid paraphrasing them in ways that change their meaning. The wider significance is the author’s account of personal danger and the effect that perceived threats may have had on his decisions about accommodation, communication, and seeking help.

Entry 69 — Inability to report incidents. This entry concerns the author’s allegation that he was unable to report incidents effectively. The reasons may include practical barriers, access to communication, distress, fear, lack of assistance, uncertainty about jurisdiction, or a previous experience of non-response; the particular reasons must be established from the author's account and relevant records. The absence of a contemporaneous report should not automatically be interpreted as proof that an event did not happen, particularly where the author explains barriers to reporting. Equally, a later account should be dated and described accurately. This entry is significant because the ability to report harm affects whether an event enters an official record at all. The archive's chronology should therefore preserve not only reported events but also the author's explanation of delays, barriers, and attempts to obtain assistance.

Entry 70 — False accusations leading to defamation. This entry alleges that false accusations were made against the author and caused reputational harm. The evidence should identify the specific accusation, who made or circulated it where known, whether it was recorded or published, and the consequences the author attributes to it.

The falsity of a statement, the person's knowledge of its falsity, and the resulting reputational damage are separate questions. A reader should be able to compare the original statement with any documentary material that contradicts it, rather than rely on a summary alone. The entry matters because the author contends that allegations made about him affected his ability to obtain support and to be heard in other processes. The named-parties register can help locate relevant entities, but inclusion in a register is not a finding that a person made a false accusation.

Entry 71 — Forced displacement. This entry records the author's allegation that he was forced to leave a place or living arrangement. It overlaps thematically with earlier homelessness and removal entries, but should remain in the published schedule as a separate entry unless the source establishes that it is a duplicate. The chronology should identify the location, the event that prompted departure, the alternatives available, and the resulting accommodation circumstances. It should distinguish a departure that occurred from the separate question of whether another person or institution unlawfully forced it. The significance of the entry is cumulative: displacement can interrupt access to belongings, records, support, income, and familiar networks. The archive should make those consequences visible while linking the specific evidence for this episode.

Entry 72 — Systemic financial exploitation. This entry alleges that financial exploitation occurred through a wider pattern rather than through a single isolated transaction. The term systemic requires evidence of a pattern, while exploitation requires identification of the conduct and its effect. The documentary inquiry should therefore identify each relevant transaction, fee, payment, funding decision, or alleged misuse, and then explain what evidence links the incidents. Different disputes should not be added together as if they all had the same cause. The entry's significance is the author's concern that financial vulnerability was aggravated by several interacting events. An itemised chronology and source-linked accounting would allow readers to test that interpretation and distinguish documented financial losses from estimated or disputed amounts.

Entry 73 — Character assassination. This entry concerns the author's allegation of sustained efforts to damage his reputation or credibility. It is related to the earlier entries about defamation and false accusations, but should not automatically be treated as proof of a coordinated campaign. The evidence should identify the statements or actions at issue, their sources, their timing, and any documented consequences. A series of negative statements may be relevant to a pattern, but the claim that they were coordinated or motivated by a common purpose requires additional support. The significance of the entry is that credibility can affect how a person's later complaints are received, particularly when those complaints concern multiple institutions. The archive's role is to preserve original communications so that readers can examine their wording and context.

Entry 74 — False charges or false accusations. This entry records the author's allegation that charges or accusations against him were false. The schedule does not itself establish that a criminal charge was laid, that a particular allegation was formally made, or that a finding of falsity was reached. The underlying documents must identify which of those circumstances applies. The review should distinguish an informal accusation, a complaint, a police investigation, a formal charge, and a judicial outcome.

Those are materially different stages. The author's account should be retained, but the wording must reflect the source: where a document records an accusation, it establishes that the accusation was recorded, not necessarily that it was true or false.

This distinction is essential to a reliable public archive and helps readers follow the sequence without confusing allegations with adjudicated outcomes.

Entry 75 — Forced homelessness. This entry returns to homelessness, already recorded at entry 3. Its appearance later in the schedule may reflect a separate episode, a later consequence, or repetition of the same broad theme; the source material must establish which interpretation is appropriate. It should not be silently deleted or merged simply because similar wording appears earlier. The evidence should identify the relevant period, accommodation arrangement, events preceding the loss of housing, and assistance sought or received. The entry's significance is that homelessness can be both an immediate harm and a condition that compounds other difficulties, including keeping documents safe, accessing services, and maintaining communication. The archive should distinguish each identifiable episode while explaining how it fits into the larger chronology.

Transition to Part II Entries 61–75 bring the schedule from allegations concerning compensation, political conduct, and threats into a section increasingly focused on systemic consequences and repeated barriers to safety and redress.

The archive's central discipline remains the same: preserve the author's testimony, identify the documentary basis for each proposition, and make the remaining questions explicit. Similar wording across several entries may indicate recurrence, overlap, or duplication; it does not, by itself, prove separate incidents or a coordinated plan.

Next: entries 76–90, including the source's missing number 84. That gap will remain visible and will not be filled with an invented allegation.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 76–90: threats, access to justice, institutional responses, and alleged coordination

Entry 76 — Physical violence. This entry records the author's allegation of physical violence. The supporting chronology should identify the incident or incidents, the approximate date and location, the nature of the alleged conduct, any injuries or consequences described, and any contemporaneous records. Where a medical record, police report, photograph, witness statement, or other document exists, it should be linked to the specific event it supports. A record that an allegation was made is not automatically proof that the alleged assault occurred, but it is evidence of the report and its timing. The entry's significance is that physical safety forms part of the author's account of harm and should not be lost among the larger administrative and financial issues documented elsewhere in the archive.

Entry 77 — Death threats. This entry records allegations of threats to kill or cause death. It is important to preserve the precise words or conduct described, the circumstances in which the threat was communicated, and any subsequent steps taken to seek help. If the archive contains a relevant transcript, the transcript should be linked directly rather than relying solely on a summary. One potentially relevant source is the AbleCare murder-threat call transcript.

Its title indicates the subject attributed to that document, but the title alone does not establish the content, identity of any speaker, authenticity, or legal significance of the recording. The reader should examine the underlying material and its context. The entry is significant because the author reports serious concerns about personal safety and the response to those concerns.

Entry 78 — Denial of legal representation. This entry concerns the author’s allegation that he was unable to obtain legal representation when he needed it. The documentary inquiry should identify the particular proceeding or dispute, the assistance sought, the response received, and the practical consequences of proceeding without representation. A refusal of legal assistance, a decision that a matter falls outside an organisation’s remit, a lack of available funding, and a formal denial of a legal entitlement are different circumstances. They should not be collapsed into one conclusion. The Legal Aid NSW guardianship advice letter dated 14 January 2026 is one relevant record to examine in its proper context. The wider significance is the author’s concern that navigating complicated administrative and legal systems without adequate assistance placed him at a disadvantage.

Entry 79 — Obstruction of access to justice. This entry alleges that actions or omissions obstructed the author’s ability to pursue a remedy. The relevant evidence should specify the route the author attempted to use, the procedural obstacle encountered, the response from the organisation involved, and the effect on his ability to progress the matter. An unfavourable decision or jurisdictional refusal does not automatically establish deliberate obstruction. However, a documented sequence of referrals, refusals, unanswered correspondence, or conflicting explanations may raise questions about whether an effective path to review was available. The archive should make that sequence traceable through its Federal Court and AAT pathway, official correspondence, and timeline. The significance of this entry lies in the distinction between a person having a theoretical avenue of redress and being practically able to use it.

Entry 80 — Institutional non-response to complaints. This entry records an alleged pattern of complaints receiving no substantive response or no response that addressed the issues raised. The chronology should identify each complaint, its recipient, the date sent, any acknowledgment, the response received, and what remained unanswered. It is important to distinguish a complete absence of response from an acknowledgment, a jurisdictional explanation, a referral, a refusal to investigate, or a decision not to allocate a complaint for further action. Those responses can have different implications, even where the author considers each inadequate. The official-document index and government evidence folder provide routes for tracing relevant correspondence. The entry's significance is cumulative: repeated unresolved complaints can leave a person without a clear explanation of what has been considered, by whom, or what options remain.

Entry 81 — Police complicity. This high-consequence entry records the author's allegation that police conduct, inaction, or relationships with other actors amounted to complicity in wrongdoing. Complicity is a serious characterisation and requires evidence specific to the conduct alleged. A failure to investigate, a decision not to take action, a jurisdictional explanation, and active participation in wrongdoing are not equivalent. The archive should identify the police interaction in question, preserve the original statement or correspondence, and distinguish the author's interpretation from what the document expressly records. One relevant source is the police statement dated 14 August 2022. That document may establish what was reported and when; its existence alone does not determine how the report was handled or whether any allegation was substantiated. The importance of this entry is that the author seeks an intelligible account of how his reports of harm were received and addressed.

Entry 82 — Suppression of dissent. This entry alleges that the author's efforts to raise concerns or publish his account were suppressed. The evidence should identify the particular act said to have restricted his expression, such as a documented direction, removal, refusal, threat, or other intervention, and establish its source and effect. A critical response, a moderation decision, a refusal to publish, and unlawful suppression are distinct matters. The archive should not treat them as interchangeable, but it should preserve communications that the author considers relevant to his ability to speak publicly. The wider context is the archive itself: the author has assembled records and testimony in an effort to maintain a durable public account of his concerns. The main Barran Dodger archive allows readers to navigate the material and assess the chronology for themselves.

Entry 83 — Government concealment. This entry alleges that government information was concealed or withheld in circumstances the author considers significant. The inquiry must distinguish a document that was never located, a document withheld under an asserted legal exemption, a record that was not forwarded, a refusal to disclose, and evidence of deliberate concealment. Those outcomes can overlap in a broader narrative, but they do not prove the same thing. The author’s correspondence with government offices, responses to information requests, and official explanations are therefore particularly important. For example, the archive identifies a Prime Minister’s Office response dated 12 December 2022, described in the archive as stating that the email had not been forwarded. That record is relevant to the handling of the communication; it does not by itself establish a wider government cover-up. The significance of the entry is the author’s effort to understand what information reached decision-makers and what happened to his requests after submission.

Entry 84 — No published entry identified. The published second section of the schedule moves from entry 83 to entry 85. Entry 84 is absent from that source, and no replacement allegation should be invented to fill the gap. The missing number is itself a small but important archival detail: a reader should be able to distinguish an omitted or unavailable entry from an entry that has been examined and rejected. If a dated original, earlier version, or separate supporting record is later identified, it can be compared with the published schedule before any restoration is made. Until then, the responsible description is simply that entry 84 is absent from the published source. This preserves the numbering accurately and avoids implying that a missing entry contains a particular allegation or that the gap proves concealment.

Entry 85 — NDIS denial of necessary supports. This entry records the author's allegation that necessary disability-related supports were denied or not adequately provided. The documentary review should identify the support sought, the organisation responsible for the decision, the applicable process, the reason given, and the practical effect on the author. It is important to distinguish a formal funding decision from the conduct of an individual provider, the availability of a service, and the responsibilities of the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission. A letter from the Commission dated 3 June 2021 is listed in the archive as addressing the question of whether the author was an employee of that Commission; it should not be mistaken for a comprehensive determination of every support issue. The document can be read here. The significance of this entry is the relationship between formal support arrangements and the author's practical ability to live safely and maintain stability.

Entry 86 — NDIS or provider financial exploitation. This entry alleges financial exploitation associated with disability services or providers. The evidence should identify the transaction or arrangement, the parties involved, the service or funding concerned, and the reason the author considers the conduct exploitative. Billing disputes, poor service, unauthorised charges, misuse of funds, and deliberate exploitation are different claims and require different evidence. Original invoices, service agreements, payment records, correspondence, and any relevant review outcome should be linked to the individual allegation. The entry should also distinguish the conduct attributed to a particular provider from any allegation about the wider NDIS system. Its significance is the author's concern that financial vulnerability and dependence on support services may have increased the consequences of disputed transactions or inadequate safeguards. The documentary record should allow the reader to follow the money and identify what remains disputed.

Entry 87 — Neglect by support providers. This entry records the author's allegation that support providers failed to provide appropriate assistance or respond adequately to identified needs. The evidence should specify what assistance was expected, what occurred instead, the relevant dates, and any consequences described. A disagreement about the scope of a service is not necessarily neglect; nor does a missed appointment alone establish a systemic pattern. The surrounding evidence may nevertheless reveal recurring failures, particularly where the author says that a provider knew of a serious need but did not respond. Service agreements, support plans, communications, incident records, and complaints are useful for reconstructing the sequence. The entry's importance is practical as well as documentary: where a person depends on support, the failure of an expected service may affect daily living, safety, communication, and access to other assistance.

Entry 88 — Institutional isolation. This entry concerns the author's allegation that institutional actions or failures contributed to isolation. The documentary inquiry should identify the particular decisions or events said to have reduced contact with support networks, limited access to services, or made it harder to communicate with others. Isolation may result from several interacting circumstances; evidence of an effect does not, by itself, establish that the effect was deliberately intended. The archive should distinguish documented restrictions and communications from the author's broader interpretation of their combined significance. Its relevance is that isolation can magnify the consequences of homelessness, financial hardship, health difficulties, and administrative disputes. A person who lacks reliable support may also find it harder to preserve evidence or pursue complaints. The entry therefore connects the personal consequences described in the testimony with the wider chronology of service and administrative interactions.

Entry 89 — Political manipulation. This high-consequence entry alleges political manipulation affecting the author or the handling of his concerns. The evidence should identify the alleged act, the people or offices involved, the decision or communication affected, and the basis for inferring manipulation rather than ordinary political or administrative decision-making. Timing, correspondence, and documented inconsistencies may be relevant, but an adverse outcome or a referral between offices does not alone prove coordinated political interference. The author’s letters to senior government offices and the responses preserved in the archive provide a documentary route for examining how his requests were handled. The 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister is one starting point. The significance of this entry is the author’s concern about political accountability and whether the substance of his representations received meaningful consideration.

Entry 90 — Organised harassment. This entry alleges that harassment was organised or coordinated rather than consisting solely of unrelated incidents. That distinction requires evidence connecting events, actors, communications, or methods. A series of distressing events may be relevant to a pattern, but the existence of a pattern does not automatically establish common direction or intent. The schedule should therefore identify the underlying incidents and link each to its source, while clearly marking any proposed connection as an inference that requires further examination. The author’s account of cumulative harm remains important, including where individual events have not been independently resolved. The archive’s role is to preserve the chronology and make the alleged connections visible for scrutiny without converting a hypothesis into an established fact.

What entries 76–90 contribute to the master record These entries bring together three recurring themes in the author’s account: personal safety, access to meaningful remedies, and the difficulty of determining responsibility when complaints pass through multiple organisations.

The documentary distinction matters. An official letter may establish that a complaint was received, referred, declined, restricted, or answered in a particular way. It does not necessarily establish that the underlying allegation was true or false. Equally, an administrative decision not to proceed does not, by itself, settle every factual question raised by the author. Each record should be read for what it actually says, in the context of the chronology and any related documents.

The source gap at entry 84 remains explicit. The schedule continues with entry 85 rather than filling the gap by inference.

Next: entries 91–105, continuing in the published order through allegations concerning psychological manipulation, discrimination, workers’ compensation, whistleblower protection, grievances, and accommodation insecurity.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 91–105: psychological harm, discrimination, employment classification, whistleblower protection, and access to redress

Entry 91 — Psychological manipulation. This entry records the author’s allegation that psychological manipulation contributed to his distress or vulnerability. The evidence should identify the conduct being described, the circumstances in which it occurred, any communications or witness accounts, and the effect the author reports. It is important to distinguish an identifiable act or statement from an interpretation of motive, particularly where the allegation concerns a pattern over time. The archive should preserve the author’s account without presenting an unverified explanation as an established fact. The significance of this entry is that psychological harm may interact with other difficulties documented throughout the archive, including financial hardship, isolation, disputes over services, and difficulty obtaining assistance. The reader should be able to trace the underlying incidents rather than being asked to accept a broad label without supporting detail.

Entry 92 — State-sanctioned torture. This high-consequence entry records the author's allegation of torture or severe mistreatment involving state authority or state responsibility. The term carries a specific gravity and should be examined against the conduct alleged, the circumstances, the people or institutions involved, and the applicable legal meaning. Distressing treatment, inadequate services, unlawful conduct, and torture are not interchangeable categories. The author's testimony should remain part of the record, while any legal characterisation should be distinguished from the factual material supporting it. Relevant evidence may include contemporaneous complaints, medical records, official correspondence, and records of the author's attempts to seek protection or review. The significance of the entry is the author's contention that the harm he describes cannot be understood solely as an isolated personal dispute, but must also be examined in relation to the responsibilities of public institutions.

Entry 93 — Systemic discrimination. This entry alleges discrimination arising from a pattern of conduct or institutional arrangements. The documentary inquiry should identify the relevant decision or treatment, the protected attribute or other basis said to have been involved where applicable, the comparison or contextual evidence, and the consequences for the author. An adverse outcome does not by itself prove discrimination, but a sequence of decisions may warrant closer examination when the records reveal inconsistent treatment, unequal access, or explanations that appear difficult to reconcile. The archive should distinguish evidence of an individual decision from evidence supporting a broader systemic claim. The significance of this entry is the author's concern that barriers encountered across different services and administrative processes may have compounded one another. The underlying correspondence and decisions are more informative than the label alone.

Entry 94 — Financial ruin caused by institutional conduct. This entry concerns the author's allegation that institutional conduct contributed to severe financial deterioration. It requires a chronology connecting the relevant decisions or events with specific financial consequences. The evidence might include income records, benefit or compensation decisions, invoices, debts, accommodation costs, correspondence, and an itemised account of claimed losses. A financial loss and its cause are separate questions: a balance sheet can show a shortfall, while the reasons for that shortfall require further analysis. Where several events contributed, their effects should be distinguished rather than attributed to a single cause without supporting evidence. The entry's significance is that financial hardship can become a multiplier of other difficulties, restricting access to housing, communication, transport, legal assistance, and essential daily needs. Any monetary estimate in the archive should be labelled according to its basis and uncertainty.

Entry 95 — Physical and psychological torment. This entry records the author's allegation of sustained physical and psychological suffering. The archive should describe the reported experiences, their chronology, and their effects without assuming that every event had the same cause. Where medical or other professional records exist, they should be linked and described according to what they actually document. The absence of a particular record does not erase a person's testimony, but it should be made clear when a claim rests primarily on first-person recollection. This entry is significant because the author's account of suffering forms part of the human context for the administrative documents. Letters, decisions, and complaint files can appear abstract when separated from their consequences. The testimony explains why the author considers the accumulated events urgent and why he has continued to preserve a detailed record.

Entry 96 — Intimidation or exile from support networks. This entry alleges that intimidation or other circumstances contributed to the author's separation from support networks. The evidence should identify the particular relationship, communication, event, or restriction involved and distinguish direct threats from the author's interpretation of the surrounding circumstances. A loss of contact may arise for many reasons, so claims of deliberate intimidation or coordinated exclusion require specific supporting material. The author's own account remains important in explaining the consequences of the loss of support. This entry connects with the earlier schedule entries concerning institutional isolation and forced displacement. Together, these subjects raise questions about how practical support, accommodation, personal relationships, and the ability to report harm interacted over time. The documentary record should make those connections traceable without assuming that every event was coordinated.

Entry 97 — Failure to protect a vulnerable person. This entry records the author's allegation that people or organisations with relevant responsibilities failed to provide adequate protection. The key questions are what risk was communicated, to whom, when it was communicated, what responsibility the recipient had, and what response followed. A complaint or warning can establish that a concern was raised; additional evidence is needed to determine what the recipient knew, what action was reasonably available, and whether a failure occurred. The author's chronology of requests for assistance is therefore central. The entry's significance lies in the relationship between vulnerability and institutional responsibility: the author contends that the consequences of his circumstances were aggravated when protection or practical assistance did not materialise. The record should allow readers to examine the reported risk and the actual response separately.

Entry 98 — Failure to respond despite identified risk. This entry is closely related to entry 97 but focuses more specifically on the allegation that a risk had been identified and that the response remained inadequate. The documentary review should locate the communication in which the risk was raised, establish the date and recipient, and compare the stated concern with the action taken. A response may have occurred without resolving the risk, and a response that the author considers inadequate should not automatically be described as no response at all. Conversely, an acknowledgment alone does not establish that the substance of a safety concern was addressed. The significance of this entry is the need to reconstruct what was known at each point in the chronology and what followed. This is particularly important when the author alleges that repeated requests for help did not lead to a practical change in his circumstances.

Entry 99 — Contradictory employment classifications. This entry concerns the author's allegation that different records or institutional positions treated his employment status inconsistently. It is one of the more document-specific issues in the archive. The Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021 and the Federal Court assessment dated 27 March 2023 are important starting points. The latter is described in the archive as stating: "On the information you have provided me, I am satisfied that you are, or were, an employee with the Department of Social Services, providing services under the trading name Rich McLean, Arts Life Coach, Peer-Support Worker & Mental Health Advocate. " That statement must be read in its full context and with its stated qualification; it should not be represented as a court judgment if it was an assessment or correspondence rather than a judicial decision. The central question is how the different documents defined the relationship, what legal tests they applied, and whether the apparent difference affected the handling of the compensation claim.

Entry 100 — Consequential denial of workers' compensation. This entry records the author's allegation that the treatment of his employment status contributed to the denial of workers' compensation. It builds on entry 99 but addresses the alleged practical consequence rather than the classification issue alone. The relevant records include the Comcare claim filed on 25 May 2021, the Comcare determination, and the AAT/ART decision of 12 July 2023. The reader should distinguish the initial determination, the reasoning recorded in later proceedings, and any subsequent assessment of employment status. Whether a later document changes the legal position requires analysis of the applicable legislation and the scope of each decision.

The significance is the author's contention that an unresolved or inconsistent classification had material consequences for access to compensation.

Entry 101 — Failure to protect an alleged whistleblower. This entry concerns the author's allegation that he raised concerns about wrongdoing and was not adequately protected as a result. The first documentary task is to identify the disclosure or disclosures, their recipients, dates, subject matter, and the legal or administrative framework under which they were made. The second is to identify what protection the author sought and what response followed. A person describing themselves as a whistleblower, a disclosure being recorded, and a disclosure being formally recognised under a particular statutory regime are distinct matters. The archive should preserve the author's description while accurately stating how each organisation characterised the communication. Relevant correspondence includes the Attorney-General's Department letter dated 19 September 2023, reference MC23-028244 and the Commonwealth Ombudsman PID non-allocation record. These documents help reconstruct the administrative handling of the matters raised; their existence alone does not resolve every underlying allegation.

Entry 102 — Retaliation following disclosures. This entry alleges that adverse treatment followed the author's disclosures or complaints. The principal issue is chronology: what was disclosed, when it was disclosed, what subsequent events occurred, and what evidence supports a causal relationship between them. Temporal sequence can be relevant, but the fact that one event followed another does not alone establish retaliation or motive. The record should identify specific changes in treatment, communications, decisions, threats, or restrictions that the author attributes to his disclosures. It should also preserve any explanation offered by the other party. The significance of this entry is that a person who believes they have experienced retaliation may become reluctant to report further concerns. The archive's documentary method makes it possible to examine whether the alleged pattern is supported by the sequence of records rather than relying exclusively on general descriptions.

Entry 103 — Failure to engage with grievances. This entry records the author's allegation that institutions did not meaningfully engage with the substance of his grievances. The documentary review should compare what the author actually asked, what issues were raised, and what each response addressed. A letter may answer a procedural question without addressing the substantive complaint; it may also explain that the recipient lacks jurisdiction or that another process applies. Such a response is not identical to complete silence, although the author may still consider it inadequate.

The archive should make this distinction visible. The Attorney-General's Department correspondence dated 6 February 2025, reference MC25-000321 and the Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction letter dated 8 August 2025 are among the records the author identifies as relevant to the broader history of administrative engagement. Each should be read for its actual terms and scope.

Entry 104 — Denial of effective redress. This entry alleges that the available complaint and review processes did not provide an effective way to resolve the author's concerns.

The inquiry should examine not merely whether a process existed, but what it was capable of deciding, what issues it accepted for consideration, what outcome it produced, and whether the author had a practical route to challenge or clarify that outcome. A jurisdictional refusal, a service restriction, a decision not to allocate a disclosure, and a substantive determination on the merits are different kinds of administrative action. The archive should not portray them as interchangeable, but it can document how multiple outcomes affected the author's overall ability to pursue his concerns. The significance of this entry is the cumulative experience the author describes: repeated engagement with formal channels without what he considers a satisfactory resolution. The official-document index and timeline provide starting points for following the sequence.

Entry 105 — Accommodation insecurity. This entry concerns the author's allegation that his accommodation remained insecure. Housing stability is a practical condition that affects nearly every other aspect of a person's life: keeping documents safe, maintaining a phone and internet connection, attending appointments, storing belongings, and remaining connected to support networks. The evidence should identify the accommodation arrangements, relevant notices or communications, assistance sought, and the actual outcome at each stage. A threat of eviction, an insecure temporary arrangement, and confirmed homelessness are different circumstances and should be dated separately. The entry is significant because it connects the archive's administrative and financial issues with the author's immediate living conditions. The record should make clear where the author was describing a present danger, where he was describing a risk, and where he was documenting a completed event.

What entries 91–105 contribute to the master record These entries bring the focus back to the relationship between the author's personal circumstances and the administrative records he has preserved. The most concrete documentary thread concerns employment classification and workers' compensation: the Comcare determination, the later assessment concerning employment with the Department of Social Services, and the tribunal record need to be compared carefully, each within its own scope.

The whistleblower and grievance entries raise a related but distinct question: what happened to the concerns the author submitted, how did the receiving organisations classify those communications, and what practical routes remained available after each response? Those questions can be examined through the original correspondence without treating every refusal, referral, or restriction as proof of misconduct.

Finally, accommodation insecurity is not merely a background detail. It concerns the material conditions in which a person attempts to preserve evidence, communicate with institutions, and seek assistance. The author's testimony should be read alongside the dated records so that the documentary chronology retains the human consequences that give the archive its purpose.

Next: entries 106–120, continuing in published order through eviction threats, property-related allegations, institutional victimisation, failures to investigate, and systemic marginalisation.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 106–120: housing threats, property incidents, institutional victimisation, and failures of investigation

Entry 106 — Eviction threats despite support dependency. This entry records the author's allegation that eviction threats or accommodation pressures arose despite his dependence on support services or other assistance. The documentary inquiry should identify the accommodation arrangement, the communication or action said to constitute a threat, the parties involved, and the circumstances affecting the author's ability to secure alternative housing. It is important to distinguish a warning, a notice, a proposed change to an accommodation arrangement, and an actual eviction. The existence of a threat does not alone establish that an eviction occurred or that the conduct was unlawful. Nevertheless, the author's concern deserves to be understood in its practical context: a person who depends on support may face particular difficulties when housing becomes unstable. The evidence should therefore record both the relevant communications and the consequences for safety, continuity of care, access to belongings, and the ability to maintain contact with support networks.

Entry 107 — Sabotage of property. This entry records the author’s allegation that property was deliberately damaged, interfered with, or rendered unusable. The evidence should identify the particular property, the condition before and after the alleged event, the date on which the problem was discovered, and any photographs, repair records, technical assessments, witness accounts, or reports made at the time.

Damage or malfunction does not by itself establish sabotage; the allegation of deliberate interference requires evidence supporting that interpretation. The archive should preserve the author’s account while distinguishing observed damage from conclusions about its cause or the identity of any responsible person. The significance of this entry is that interference with property can have consequences beyond the replacement cost, particularly if the property contains documents, communications, equipment, or materials needed to preserve the wider record.

Entry 108 — Home invasion. This entry records the author’s allegation of a home invasion. The chronology should establish what happened, when and where it allegedly occurred, whether entry was authorised, what property or personal security was affected, and whether any contemporaneous report exists. The term home invasion carries a serious implication and should be used consistently with the facts recorded in the underlying material. An unexplained entry, missing property, a damaged lock, and a confirmed unlawful entry are not necessarily the same event. Relevant evidence may include photographs, police correspondence, repair records, witness accounts, or the author’s dated notes. The entry’s significance is the author’s concern about the security of his living environment and the potential effect on his ability to feel safe, preserve documents, and maintain a stable home. The supporting record should allow readers to distinguish what was observed from what remains uncertain.

Entry 109 — Coordinated institutional victimisation. This high-consequence entry alleges that conduct by multiple institutions formed a coordinated pattern of victimisation. The central question is whether the documents demonstrate actual coordination, rather than several organisations making separate decisions or responding to different aspects of the author's complaints. The evidence should identify the institutions, the relevant decisions or communications, the sequence of events, and any direct links that support the alleged connection. Similar outcomes, repeated referrals, or administrative failures may justify further examination, but do not by themselves establish a common plan. The author's broader interpretation should remain visible as an allegation and investigative proposition. Its significance is that the archive attempts to connect individual episodes into a wider account of cumulative detriment. The named-institutions register and institutional map can help readers identify the organisations discussed, while the original records are needed to evaluate each alleged connection.

Entry 110 — Deliberate destruction of reputation. This entry records the author's allegation that deliberate actions damaged his reputation. It is related to earlier entries concerning defamation, false accusations, and character assassination, but the evidence must identify the particular statements or actions relevant to this entry. The chronology should establish what was communicated, to whom, in what context, and what consequences followed. A statement may be inaccurate without having been deliberately fabricated, and reputational harm does not by itself establish a coordinated campaign. The author's interpretation should therefore be distinguished from the wording of the underlying communications. This entry is significant because reputation can affect access to work, services, relationships, support, and opportunities to have later complaints considered fairly. Preserving original statements and responses allows readers to examine the context rather than relying on summaries or labels.

Entry 111 — Indifference after repeated complaints. This entry concerns the author’s allegation that organisations remained indifferent despite repeated requests for assistance or investigation. The documentary task is to establish the sequence of complaints, the information supplied, the responses received, and any action taken. It is useful to distinguish a lack of acknowledgment from a procedural response, a refusal to act, a referral elsewhere, and a substantive decision that the author considers inadequate. Those distinctions do not minimise the impact of an unresolved complaint; they make it possible to understand precisely what occurred. The archive identifies several records concerning government correspondence and complaint handling, including the Prime Minister’s Office response of 12 December 2022 and the Commonwealth Ombudsman service-restriction letter of 8 August 2025. Each should be read within its actual scope. The broader significance is the author’s contention that repeated attempts to obtain attention did not produce the assistance or resolution he sought.

Entry 112 — Failure to investigate alleged wrongdoing. This entry alleges that reports of wrongdoing were not investigated adequately. The evidence should identify the specific report, the organisation that received it, the investigation or assessment requested, and the outcome communicated. It is important to distinguish an investigation that did not occur, an initial assessment that concluded further action was not warranted, a referral to another body, and an investigation that took place but did not substantiate the allegation. A decision not to investigate does not automatically establish a cover-up or prove the underlying allegation. Equally, a record that a matter was closed does not necessarily answer every factual question the author raised. The entry’s significance is the author’s concern about how reported wrongdoing was handled and whether the reasons for non-action were sufficiently clear. The original correspondence, including the relevant complaint and response, should be linked together so that the reader can follow both sides of the administrative exchange.

Entry 113 — Improper dismissal of disclosures. This entry concerns the author’s allegation that disclosures were dismissed improperly or without adequate consideration. The inquiry should identify the disclosure, the framework under which it was submitted, the reasons given for declining or closing it, and whether the response addressed the substance of the information supplied. A decision that a disclosure does not meet a statutory definition, falls outside jurisdiction, or does not justify further action is not automatically improper. However, the author may reasonably identify unanswered questions about how the decision was reached or what happened to the information. The record should therefore distinguish the institution’s stated rationale from the author’s criticism of it. Relevant documents include the Attorney-General’s Department letter dated 19 September 2023 and the Commonwealth Ombudsman PID non-allocation record. These records are relevant to the handling of disclosures, but their scope must not be overstated.

Entry 114 — Bureaucratic processes alleged to prolong harm. This entry records the author’s allegation that administrative processes prolonged or compounded existing harm. The issue is not simply whether a process took time, but what happened during that period, what information was available, what action was requested, and whether delays or procedural requirements had material consequences. The chronology should identify application dates, requests for further information, referrals, decisions, review opportunities, and the time between each stage. Delay can result from complexity, resource constraints, statutory requirements, missing information, or administrative failure; the cause should not be assumed without evidence. The author’s account is that the accumulated burden of navigating multiple processes contributed to his circumstances. This entry is significant because it connects the timeline of official actions with the timeline of personal consequences. A clear sequence can show where a process advanced, where it stalled, and where an explanation or decision remains missing.

Entry 115 — Consequences of institutional exclusion. This entry concerns the author's allegation that exclusion from institutions, services, or administrative pathways had cumulative consequences. The evidence should identify the specific exclusions and their practical effects rather than treating every refusal as equivalent. For example, a service may decline a request because it lacks jurisdiction, while another organisation may restrict contact or determine that a complaint does not qualify for a particular process. These decisions can have different legal and practical implications, even if the author experiences them as part of a broader pattern. The entry's significance lies in the combined effects: losing one avenue of assistance may make it more difficult to use another, especially when the person is also dealing with financial hardship or unstable accommodation. The archive should make these connections visible while preserving the distinction between documented decisions and the author's interpretation of their combined effect.

Entry 116 — Alleged campaign to destroy credibility. This high-consequence entry alleges that a campaign was directed at undermining the author's credibility. The key word is campaign: it implies a connection between events, actors, or communications that must be demonstrated rather than inferred from similarity alone. The documentary inquiry should identify the statements or actions at issue, their chronology, any evidence of communication between relevant actors, and the consequences the author attributes to them. It should distinguish demonstrably inaccurate statements from disputed opinions, adverse assessments, or administrative conclusions. The author's concern is that damage to credibility may affect whether later complaints are heard or whether offers of assistance are made. The archive's timeline and named-institutions register may help locate related records. Neither a list of organisations nor the existence of several adverse interactions proves coordination; the primary documents must establish what can responsibly be said.

Entry 117 — Alleged campaign to cause or contribute to death. This high-consequence entry records the author's allegation that a campaign or pattern of conduct placed his life at risk or was intended to cause, or contribute to, his death. The allegation should be handled with particular care because it combines an asserted pattern with a grave claim about consequences or intent. The evidence should identify the specific threats, incidents, communications, and reported risks, as well as any requests for protection and the responses received. A person's fear of death, evidence of exposure to danger, and evidence that another person intended to cause death are different propositions and should be recorded separately. The author's testimony about fear and vulnerability remains important even where the identity, intent, or coordination of other actors has not been independently established. The entry's significance is the seriousness of the safety concerns described in the archive and the need for an accurate, chronological account of what was reported and what followed.

Entry 118 — Failure to intervene despite identified risk of death. This entry alleges that an appropriate person or organisation failed to intervene despite a risk of death having been identified. The central documentary questions are whether the risk was communicated, what information the recipient had, what responsibilities or options applied, and what action followed. A communication describing fear of death is evidence that the fear was reported; the assessment of the actual risk and the adequacy of the response requires examination of the full circumstances. The record should also distinguish an immediate emergency report from a longer-term complaint or retrospective account. This entry is important because it focuses not only on the alleged source of danger, but on the response to a reported danger. It should be read alongside any specific threat records, the dated requests for assistance, and the author's account of the practical safety measures available to him.

Entry 119 — Institutional responsibility for foreseeable consequences. This entry alleges that institutional conduct contributed to consequences that should have been foreseeable. The inquiry should identify the decision or omission, the information available at the time, the consequence that followed, and the basis for arguing that the consequence could reasonably have been anticipated. Foreseeability is not the same as proof of intent, and a harmful outcome does not automatically establish that a particular institution was legally responsible for it. The evidence should make clear which organisation had which information and what action was available to it. This entry is significant because it moves from the author's account of individual events to a question about responsibility for their cumulative consequences. A well-supported chronology can help readers distinguish direct causation, contributing circumstances, and unresolved causal claims.

Entry 120 — Systemic marginalisation. This entry concludes the second published section of the schedule with an allegation of systemic marginalisation. It concerns the author's interpretation that recurring barriers across different areas of life and administration left him increasingly excluded from opportunities, support, or effective avenues of response. The term systemic calls for evidence of recurring mechanisms or patterns, not merely a collection of unrelated adverse outcomes. Relevant material may include the employment and compensation records, disability-support correspondence, complaint responses, accommodation records, and other documents already discussed. The archive's purpose is to let readers trace those records and assess how the author's experiences relate to one another. The significance of the entry is the cumulative human account: the author contends that the combined effect of repeated difficulties was more severe than any single document or decision can convey in isolation.

What entries 106–120 contribute to the master record These entries close the second published section of the allegation schedule. They bring together allegations concerning housing insecurity, property and personal safety, institutional responses, and the cumulative consequences of administrative exclusion.

The central documentary task is to keep three questions distinct: What happened? Identify the event, communication, decision, or condition and link the original evidence.

What did the relevant person or organisation know? Establish what was communicated, when it was received, and what the record shows about the response.

What conclusion does the evidence support? Distinguish direct documentation, the author’s testimony, corroboration, reasonable inference, and questions that remain unresolved.

That approach does not erase the author’s account. It gives the account a traceable structure and enables readers to assess the evidence without confusing an allegation with a proven finding.

The next published section begins with entry 121 and includes a number of particularly serious allegations. The source’s own evidentiary labels must remain visible, especially where an entry is classified as high-consequence or relies primarily on the author’s narrative.

Next: entries 121–135, continuing through the published allegations concerning a recorded threat, an alleged attempted theft, assaults, sexual assault, digital intrusion, public-office conduct, evidence handling, and financial exploitation.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 121–135: recorded threats, alleged assaults, digital intrusion, public- office conduct, and financial exploitation The third published section of the schedule moves into allegations described in the archive as involving particular records, reported incidents, and proposed connections between events. Because some entries concern serious alleged criminal conduct, the original wording and source documents matter. The presence of an allegation in the schedule is not a finding that an offence occurred, and a source title alone does not establish the accuracy of its contents.

Entry 121 — Alleged threat to kill: AbleCare-titled transcript. This entry refers to an alleged threat to kill associated with a transcript bearing an AbleCare-related title. The source identified in the archive is the AbleCare murder-threat call transcript PDF. The appropriate documentary task is to examine the transcript itself, identify the exact words recorded, establish the context of the conversation, and determine what is known about the recording's origin and completeness. A title describing a murder threat is not, by itself, proof that a threat was made or that a named person made it. If the transcript records a serious threat, the chronology should also identify when the author became aware of it, whether it was reported, and what response followed. The entry is significant because it concerns the author's stated fear for personal safety and the preservation of a potentially important source of evidence.

Entry 122 — Alleged attempted theft: LEDR 23399980-titled police material. This entry refers to an alleged attempted theft and police material identified by the reference LEDR 23399980. The underlying document should be examined to determine precisely what incident was reported, what the record says about the alleged conduct, and whether it records an allegation, an investigation, an evidentiary assessment, or a formal outcome.

Those distinctions matter because a police record can establish that an incident was reported without independently proving every part of the report. The archive should preserve the reference number and relevant dates so the record can be located and compared with any related correspondence. The entry's significance is that it gives the reader a specific documentary lead rather than only a general narrative. Any claim about the identity of a person involved or the outcome of the matter should be limited to what the source supports.

Entry 123 — Alleged assaults by service or support personnel. This entry records allegations of assault involving people described as service or support personnel. The evidence should identify each alleged incident separately, including the date or period, the circumstances, the conduct described, and any complaint or contemporaneous record. It should also establish the role of the person concerned rather than assuming that everyone involved in a support arrangement had the same responsibilities. Medical documentation, service records, correspondence, witness accounts, and reports may provide different kinds of corroboration. An allegation should not be treated as a finding of guilt, but neither should the author's testimony disappear simply because a final determination is not identified in the schedule. The significance of this entry is the author's concern about safety in settings where he expected or depended on assistance. The chronology should make it possible to examine what was reported, what response followed, and what questions remain unanswered.

Entry 124 — Alleged sexual assault or drug-facilitated sexual assault. This entry records an extremely serious allegation involving sexual assault and the possibility of drug- facilitated assault. The evidence must be handled with care, respect for privacy, and attention to the author's own account. The documentary record should distinguish what the author remembers or reports, any medical or toxicological evidence that exists, any contemporaneous communications, and any report made to a relevant service. The absence of one type of evidence does not by itself determine whether an assault occurred; equally, an allegation should not be described as independently established unless the available material supports that description. Any discussion of a possible substance should reflect the actual source and not present speculation as a toxicological finding. The entry's significance is the seriousness of the harm alleged and the need for a careful, non-sensational account that preserves the author's testimony while accurately describing the evidence available.

Entry 125 — Alleged digital intrusion. This entry records an allegation of unauthorised digital access or interference. The documentary task is to identify the particular account, device, system, or data concerned; the activity observed; the date and time; and the basis for believing that access was unauthorised. Relevant evidence might include security alerts, login histories, account notifications, device logs, provider correspondence, or a technical assessment. Unusual account activity or a compromised device can have several possible explanations, so attribution to a particular person or organisation requires evidence beyond the observation of a technical problem. The entry is significant because the archive relies on digital systems to preserve and publish documents. Any suspected intrusion could affect access to communications, the integrity of files, or confidence in the record. The archive should therefore separate confirmed technical observations from the author's hypotheses about who may have been responsible.

Entry 126 — Alleged honeytrap or infiltration. This entry records the author's allegation that a person or interaction was used to gain access to him or his information under misleading pretences. The terms honeytrap and infiltration imply deliberate deception and should therefore be supported by specific evidence. The chronology should identify the interaction, what was represented to the author, what later information caused him to question those representations, and any independently documented links to other actors. A suspicious interaction or a relationship that ended badly does not alone establish a planned operation. The author's interpretation can be preserved as an investigative hypothesis, with the underlying communications linked for readers to examine. The significance of this entry is the author's concern about trust, privacy, and the possibility that personal relationships or service interactions may have exposed him to further harm. The evidentiary question is what can be established about the interaction, not merely what label has been assigned to it.

Entry 127 — Alleged coordinated conspiracy. This high-consequence entry alleges coordination between multiple people or organisations to pursue a common unlawful purpose. A conspiracy allegation requires particular care because it combines claims about conduct, relationships, knowledge, and intent. The documentary inquiry should identify the proposed participants, the acts attributed to each, the communications or other evidence said to connect them, and the chronology on which the alleged coordination rests. Similar conduct by different actors does not, without more, establish an agreement or common plan. Nor does a sequence of adverse administrative decisions establish a conspiracy simply because the author experienced them as connected. The entry's significance is that it expresses the author's wider theory about relationships between events. That theory should remain distinguishable from the underlying documents, with direct evidence, corroboration, inference, and unresolved questions identified separately. The archive's value lies in making those materials accessible rather than asking readers to accept a conclusion without examining its basis.

Entry 128 — Alleged corruption or abuse of public office. This entry concerns allegations that a public official or office was used improperly. The documentary task is to identify the office, decision, communication, or action at issue and the basis for alleging improper conduct. An administrative error, an unfavourable decision, a failure to respond, and deliberate abuse of office are different matters. The source material should establish what the official did or communicated, the relevant responsibilities, and any evidence bearing on motive or departure from proper procedure. The author's concern about public accountability should remain visible, but the archive should not state that a particular official committed corruption unless the evidence supports that assertion. The significance of this entry is its focus on the exercise of public power and the author's contention that his concerns were not adequately addressed. Original letters, decisions, and records of complaint handling are more informative than a label standing alone.

Entry 129 — Alleged concealment or suppression of evidence. This entry alleges that evidence was concealed, suppressed, or prevented from reaching a relevant decision- maker. The first task is to identify the evidence said to have been affected, where it originated, who held it, and what happened to it. A document not appearing in a disclosed file is not necessarily proof that it was deliberately concealed; it may not have been created, may not have been located, may be held elsewhere, or may have been withheld for a stated reason. Those possibilities need to be distinguished. Evidence of deliberate suppression would require a stronger factual basis than an unexplained gap.

The entry is significant because the author's archive is intended to preserve records that he considers important to understanding the history of his complaints. Its methods should include retaining original files, recording provenance where known, preserving dates, and making uncertainty about missing records explicit.

Entry 130 — Alleged false reporting. This entry records an allegation that information was reported inaccurately or falsely. The evidence should identify the specific report, its author or source where known, the statement said to be false, and the material against which it can be compared. An error, an incomplete account, a disputed interpretation, and a knowingly false report are not equivalent. The author's allegation should be presented with enough detail for readers to see what is being challenged and why. If a later record contradicts an earlier report, the chronology should include both documents rather than quoting only the material favourable to one interpretation. The significance of this entry is the potential effect of inaccurate reporting on reputation, service access, administrative decisions, or later assessments of credibility. The documentary approach is to preserve the original wording and identify discrepancies, not to infer a person's state of mind without evidence.

Entry 131 — Alleged defamatory campaign. This entry alleges that defamatory statements formed part of a broader campaign against the author. The evidence should identify each statement, the person or publication responsible where reliably known, the audience, the date, and the harm the author attributes to it. A claim of defamation involves questions about the content and publication of a statement, its meaning, applicable defences, and the relevant legal circumstances. The further claim that several statements formed a coordinated campaign requires evidence connecting them.

These questions should not be collapsed into a single conclusion. The archive can help readers examine the original communications and compare them with the author's account of their effects. The significance of the entry is the author's concern that reputational damage may have compounded other difficulties, including attempts to secure assistance and obtain a response to his complaints. The named-institutions register may assist navigation, but inclusion in the register does not itself establish defamatory conduct by any listed person or organisation.

Entry 132 — Alleged retaliation following disclosures. This entry returns to the allegation that adverse treatment followed the author's disclosures or complaints. The relevant task is to establish what was disclosed, the date and recipient, what happened afterwards, and what evidence supports a causal link. This entry may overlap with entry 102, which addresses the same general theme. That overlap should be retained in the published schedule unless the source material establishes that one entry duplicates the other entirely. Different entries may address different episodes, records, or aspects of the same alleged pattern. The archive should therefore identify the underlying event for each entry rather than assume that repeated wording necessarily means repeated incidents. The significance is the author's concern that raising matters he believed required attention may have exposed him to further disadvantage. The documentary analysis should distinguish chronology, evidence of adverse treatment, evidence of motive, and the author's broader interpretation.

Entry 133 — Alleged obstruction of access to justice. This entry returns to the question of whether the author was able to pursue a remedy. The relevant evidence includes the complaint or application submitted, the response received, the legal or administrative reason given, and the options available afterwards. A decision that a matter falls outside an organisation's jurisdiction may leave the underlying factual questions unresolved without itself proving improper obstruction. A series of such outcomes may nevertheless help explain why the author considers the overall process ineffective. The archive should identify the particular barrier in each instance and avoid treating every procedural decision as evidence of deliberate interference. The significance of this entry is the distinction between the existence of a formal pathway and the practical ability to obtain a substantive response. The Federal Court and AAT pathway provides a route into the relevant employment and compensation records, while the official- document index helps locate related correspondence.

Entry 134 — Alleged neglect despite known risk. This entry concerns an allegation that a person or organisation failed to act appropriately despite knowing, or having been informed of, a risk. The documentary inquiry should identify the warning, establish when and how it was received, and examine what action was taken. It should also distinguish actual knowledge from information that may have been available but is not shown to have been read or understood by the relevant recipient. A report of risk, an acknowledgment, an assessment, and a practical intervention are separate stages in the chronology. The author's allegation is that the response did not adequately address the circumstances he described. The significance of this entry is that it connects the question of risk to the question of responsibility: what was communicated, what could reasonably have been done, and what followed? Any conclusion should be grounded in the actual records rather than inferred solely from the eventual outcome.

Entry 135 — Alleged financial exploitation through services. This entry records an allegation that financial exploitation occurred through a service relationship. The evidence should identify the service provider or arrangement, the money or benefit involved, the terms governing the transaction, and the specific conduct considered exploitative. Relevant records may include invoices, service agreements, payment histories, funding decisions, correspondence, and any complaint or review outcome. An overcharge, a disputed invoice, a failure to deliver an agreed service, and deliberate exploitation are different claims. The archive should identify which description is supported by the available evidence and what remains contested. This entry is significant because the author describes financial vulnerability as one of the factors that compounded his other difficulties. The documentary record should make it possible to follow individual transactions and distinguish verified amounts from estimates or broader claims about systemic conduct.

What entries 121–135 contribute to the master record This section contains some of the schedule's most serious allegations, including threats to kill, sexual assault, conspiracy, public-office misconduct, evidence suppression, and financial exploitation. Their seriousness makes careful documentation especially important.

For each entry, the reader should be able to identify the underlying source, the event or statement it records, the limits of what the source establishes, and the questions that remain open. Where a document records that a complaint was made, that is evidence of the complaint and its date; it does not automatically establish the truth or falsity of the underlying allegation. Where a record contains direct evidence, its exact content and provenance should be preserved rather than replaced by a broad summary.

The archive's documentary purpose is to keep the author's testimony, the primary records, and the analysis connected. That allows readers to understand why the author considers these matters significant while distinguishing documented events from proposed explanations of how they may be related.

Next: entries 136–150, completing the published schedule, including alleged abuse of administrative process, coordinated isolation, surveillance, torture or cruel treatment, financial deprivation, cross-agency coordination, and the final entry, which the source itself describes as an investigative hypothesis.

Part Three — The allegation schedule (continued) Schedule entries 136–150: administrative process, surveillance allegations, institutional coordination, and the closing investigative hypothesis

Entry 136 — Alleged abuse of administrative process. This entry records the author's allegation that administrative procedures were used improperly or in ways that compounded his detriment. The documentary inquiry should identify the particular process, the decision or action challenged, the applicable requirements, and the evidence supporting the allegation of misuse. A procedural error, an unfavourable decision, an inflexible process, and deliberate abuse of process are different matters.

The original correspondence and decisions should therefore be preserved, with the author's interpretation distinguished from the stated reasons of the organisation involved. The entry's significance is the author's concern that the mechanisms intended to receive, assess, and resolve grievances instead became additional obstacles. The official-document index and archive timeline provide starting points for examining the sequence of administrative actions and their reported consequences.

Entry 137 — Alleged coordinated isolation. This high-consequence entry records the author's allegation that his isolation resulted from coordinated conduct by multiple people or organisations. The documentary inquiry must distinguish the fact that the author experienced isolation from the separate claim that different actors deliberately coordinated to produce it. Relevant evidence may include dated communications, service decisions, restrictions, reports of threats, and records concerning access to support networks. Similar outcomes across different settings may justify comparison, but do not independently establish an agreement or common purpose. The author's interpretation should remain visible as an investigative proposition, alongside the underlying evidence and its limitations. The entry matters because isolation can magnify other difficulties: a person with fewer reliable contacts may have greater difficulty obtaining practical assistance, preserving documents, reporting incidents, or challenging administrative decisions. The archive should preserve both the reported experience and the factual basis for any proposed connection between events.

Entry 138 — Alleged state surveillance. This entry records the author’s allegation of surveillance involving state actors or state systems. The evidence should identify the specific conduct or observation, the source of the information, the relevant date, and the basis for attributing the activity to a public authority. A privacy concern, an unexpected digital event, an official record, and verified surveillance are not interchangeable. Technical evidence, access logs, official correspondence, or other reliable records may support particular propositions, but unexplained activity alone does not establish who was responsible. The author’s concerns should be recorded accurately without presenting an unverified attribution as a proven fact. The significance of this entry is the author’s concern about privacy, personal security, and the possibility that surveillance affected his ability to communicate or preserve information. The documentary task is to identify what can be demonstrated, what is inferred, and what remains unknown.

Entry 139 — Alleged torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. This high-consequence entry records allegations of torture or other severe mistreatment, described in the schedule using the abbreviation CIDT. The evidence must be assessed against the particular conduct alleged and the applicable legal definitions. Distress, neglect, poor treatment, unlawful restraint, and torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment are not automatically equivalent, although some circumstances may raise overlapping questions. The chronology should identify the incidents, the people or institutions involved, any contemporaneous reports, medical or other records, and the responses to complaints. The author’s first-person testimony remains part of the archive even where a particular allegation has not been independently determined. The significance of this entry is the author's contention that the severity of his experiences requires examination in the context of institutional responsibilities and human dignity.

The archive should preserve the details necessary for a careful assessment without claiming that the schedule itself establishes a legal finding.

Entry 140 — Alleged attempt to cause death. This entry records an allegation that conduct was intended to cause, or contributed to circumstances that threatened, the author's death. The schedule's note that no coronial homicide finding was identified must be understood narrowly: it is not itself proof that an attempted killing occurred, and the absence of such a finding does not resolve every possible question about the events alleged. The documentary review should identify the specific incident, the conduct attributed to each person, the evidence supporting the alleged intent or risk, and any reports or responses. It is essential to distinguish the author's fear for his life, an objectively documented danger, and evidence that another person intended to cause death. The entry is significant because it expresses the gravity of the author's safety concerns. Any direct threat record or related document should be linked to the particular allegation it supports, with uncertainty about attribution and intent made explicit.

Entry 141 — Alleged institutional cover-up. This entry records the author's allegation that an institution concealed or failed to disclose information about wrongdoing or harm. The evidence should identify the information at issue, the organisation holding or expected to hold it, the relevant request or communication, and what was disclosed, withheld, or left unexplained. A refusal to release a document, a failure to locate a record, a jurisdictional decision, and deliberate concealment are distinct circumstances. The archive should retain the exact wording of official explanations and compare those explanations with the available records. The significance of this entry is the author’s concern that gaps in disclosure or explanations made it difficult to reconstruct what happened. The government evidence folder and official-document index provide routes to relevant material. The existence of an information gap is a legitimate documentary question, but a conclusion about deliberate concealment requires evidence supporting that inference.

Entry 142 — Alleged systemic discrimination. This entry returns to the allegation that discriminatory treatment occurred across a wider pattern of decisions or institutional interactions. The documentary review should identify the decisions concerned, the basis on which discrimination is alleged, the circumstances of the author at the relevant times, and any evidence of inconsistent or unequal treatment. It should distinguish an individual adverse decision from evidence that a recurring process or institutional arrangement produced discriminatory effects. Similar outcomes can be relevant but do not automatically prove a common cause. The author’s broader interpretation should be preserved while the supporting records are identified individually. This entry is significant because it brings the schedule back to the question of whether the difficulties described across employment, disability support, complaint handling, and accommodation were isolated or connected by recurring barriers. The answer requires comparison of the original documents rather than reliance on the schedule’s label alone.

Entry 143 — Alleged retaliation for complaint-making. This entry records the author’s allegation that adverse conduct followed his submission of complaints. It overlaps with earlier entries concerning retaliation after disclosures, but it may refer to a distinct set of complaints or events. The published numbering should therefore be retained unless the source material establishes that the entries duplicate the same incident. The evidence should identify the complaint, its recipient and date, the subsequent action, and any material supporting a connection between the two. A decision made after a complaint is not necessarily retaliation; the timing, stated reasons, surrounding communications, and any inconsistent treatment may be relevant to assessing the claim. The entry's significance is the author's concern that seeking an explanation or remedy may itself have been followed by disadvantage. A reliable chronology allows the reader to assess that concern without assuming motive in advance.

Entry 144 — Alleged financial deprivation through administrative decisions. This entry concerns the author's allegation that administrative decisions deprived him of money, support, or access to financial resources. The evidence should identify the relevant decision, the amount or benefit affected, the reasons provided, and the actual financial consequence. A refusal of a payment, an eligibility decision, a delayed transaction, and unlawful deprivation are not equivalent. The archive should distinguish amounts documented in official records from sums claimed or estimated by the author. It should also examine whether several decisions had cumulative effects, while avoiding the assumption that every shortfall arose from the same cause. The significance of this entry is the relationship between administrative outcomes and the author's material circumstances. Financial stability can determine whether a person can maintain housing, access communication, travel to appointments, and preserve documentary evidence. The record should therefore make the practical consequences visible alongside the administrative reasons given.

Entry 145 — Alleged cross-agency coordination. This entry alleges that actions or decisions across different agencies were coordinated in a manner relevant to the author's detriment. The evidence should identify the agencies, the particular events, the sequence of communications, and any direct documentation linking their actions. A referral from one agency to another may establish communication or a transfer of responsibility, but it does not automatically establish an improper agreement. Likewise, similar decisions may arise from shared legislation, common policies, or separate assessments rather than a coordinated plan directed at an individual. The author's interpretation should be preserved as a question for examination, with direct evidence separated from inference. The named-institutions register and institutional map can help readers navigate the organisations named in the archive. The primary documents are needed to establish what each organisation did and whether a demonstrable connection exists between them.

Entry 146 — Alleged abuse of vulnerability. This entry records the author’s allegation that his vulnerability was exploited or inadequately protected. The relevant evidence should identify the circumstances that made him vulnerable at the time, the conduct alleged, the relationship or responsibility of the person or organisation involved, and the consequences. Vulnerability may arise from financial hardship, disability-related support needs, unstable accommodation, isolation, or dependence on a particular service. Its presence does not automatically prove exploitation, but it can be important context when assessing what happened and what safeguards were relevant. The entry’s significance is that it links the author’s personal circumstances with the alleged conduct of people or institutions who interacted with him. The archive should make those circumstances understandable without treating vulnerability as a reason to discount his testimony. The central questions remain what occurred, what evidence supports the allegation, and what the relevant records show about the response.

Entry 147 — Alleged pattern of institutional non-response. This entry records an alleged pattern in which institutions did not provide substantive responses to concerns raised by the author. It is related to entry 80, which also concerns institutional non-response, and entry 111, which addresses alleged indifference after repeated complaints. The overlap should be acknowledged rather than silently erased: the entries may concern separate episodes, different organisations, or different dimensions of the same broader concern. The evidence should list the complaints, dates, recipients, acknowledgments, decisions, referrals, and matters left unanswered. An acknowledgment, a procedural explanation, and a substantive response should be distinguished. The significance of this entry is cumulative: the author contends that repeated attempts to obtain attention did not produce an adequate resolution. The official-document index can help readers follow the underlying records and determine which questions each response did or did not address.

Entry 148 — Alleged systemic obstruction of redress. This entry concerns the author's allegation that barriers to redress arose across a wider system rather than through one isolated decision. The documentary inquiry should map the different complaint and review pathways, identify the reasons given for each refusal or restriction, and establish what options remained afterwards. A jurisdictional refusal by one body does not automatically establish systemic obstruction; nor does the existence of several separate refusals prove that the institutions acted together. However, a source-linked chronology can reveal whether the author was repeatedly redirected, whether the same unresolved issue appeared across different processes, and whether an effective avenue remained available in practice. The entry's significance is its focus on the overall structure of redress rather than on one administrative outcome. The Federal Court and AAT pathway, official-document index, and timeline provide complementary routes into that documentary history.

Entry 149 — Alleged convergence of institutional failures. This entry alleges that failures across different institutions converged and produced cumulative detriment.

The term convergence can describe the combined effect of separate events without necessarily proving that the events were coordinated. That distinction is central. The evidence should identify each alleged failure, the institution responsible for the relevant action or omission, the dates, and the consequence attributed to it. It should then explain how the events interacted—for example, whether a financial decision affected accommodation, whether unstable accommodation affected communication, or whether an unresolved classification affected access to a compensation process. Those links should be supported by the chronology and relevant documents. The significance of this entry is that the author's account cannot be understood solely by reading one letter or decision in isolation. The archive seeks to show how different aspects of a person's life may be affected simultaneously, while leaving each causal claim open to examination.

Entry 150 — Alleged criminal enterprise: investigative hypothesis only. The final entry of the published schedule uses the term criminal enterprise but expressly treats it as an investigative hypothesis rather than an established finding. That qualification must remain attached to the entry wherever it is discussed. The allegation proposes a broader explanation for events described throughout the schedule; it does not establish that a criminal enterprise existed. Any serious assessment would require specific evidence of the alleged participants, the conduct attributed to each, the connection between events, and the elements of any relevant offence. Separate complaints, disputed decisions, or similar experiences cannot simply be added together to prove a common criminal purpose. The value of the entry is therefore not that it supplies a verdict, but that it records the author's overarching question about whether some of the events he has documented are connected. The archive should make the underlying sources available so that readers can distinguish established facts, first-person testimony, corroborated material, inference, and unresolved hypotheses.

The completed published allegation schedule: entries 1–150 The published schedule now has a continuous explanatory treatment of entries 1–83 and 85–150. Entry 84 remains absent from the source and has not been invented or filled with a guessed allegation.

The source schedule itself warns readers that it is an allegation and research schedule, not a finding that any person or organisation committed a crime. Its evidentiary labels distinguish stronger documentary material from incomplete evidence, matters requiring corroboration, narrative allegations, and high-consequence claims. Those labels should be retained when the schedule is quoted or republished.

The three source sections are: Entries 1–71 — Allegation matrix, Part 1 Entries 72–120 — Allegation matrix, Part 2 Entries 121–150 — Allegation matrix, Part 3 The main archive's allegation schedule provides another route to the published material.

The essential principle is to preserve the author's account in full while ensuring that every reader can distinguish the underlying document from the interpretation placed upon it. This does not diminish the importance of the allegations. It makes the record more useful: the testimony remains visible, the source material remains accessible, and conclusions can be assessed against the evidence rather than being confused with the mere presence of a claim in a schedule.

Part Four — The human being behind the archive The schedule is extensive, but it is not the whole story. Behind its entries is a person attempting to preserve a coherent account of events that he says have affected his safety, finances, reputation, accommodation, work, relationships, and access to support.

An archive can become so large that the person at its centre disappears behind the filenames, references, tables, and administrative language. That is a danger this master essay must resist. The records matter because they concern a human life, not because the number of documents is impressive in itself.

In the material presented through the Barran Dodger project, Dr Richard William McLean identifies himself as a researcher, writer, former illustrator and news graphics artist, and advocate. He identifies a PhD awarded by Victoria University in 2020 and the publication of Recovered, Not Cured by Allen & Unwin in 2003. These biographical details provide context for his identity and work; they do not, by themselves, establish the truth of every allegation in the archive. Equally, allegations about his circumstances should not be allowed to erase the work involved in assembling and preserving the documentary record.

The author has also framed aspects of his testimony through Christian faith, survival, witness, and the refusal to surrender his voice. Those expressions form part of the meaning he gives to his experience. They can be preserved as personal testimony without requiring every reader to share the same religious interpretation. His appeal to truth, justice, dignity, and human compassion is understandable in ordinary human terms as well as within his faith.

The archive's first-person statements are particularly important here. Official correspondence can record an application, a decision, or a referral, but it cannot necessarily convey what it meant to the person waiting for an answer, trying to secure accommodation, maintaining access to a telephone, or attempting to explain the same history repeatedly to different organisations. Those experiences belong in the record too.

The author describes prolonged financial and practical hardship, repeated efforts to obtain assistance, and periods of housing insecurity. These claims should be read alongside the relevant dated records where available. Their human significance does not depend on a reader accepting every broader interpretation of the events. A person's need for safety, food, communication, accommodation, and a fair hearing is not an abstract proposition.

The archive therefore has two responsibilities. The first is documentary: preserve the source material, identify its origin where known, retain dates and references, and avoid overstating what a record proves. The second is human: explain why the material matters to the person who assembled it and why the consequences described should be taken seriously.

Those responsibilities are compatible. Careful documentation does not require coldness, and compassion does not require abandoning accuracy.

Next: Part Four will continue with the immediate human consequences described in the archive, the practical meaning of homelessness and financial insecurity, the importance of preserving first-person testimony, and the difference between keeping a record and obtaining meaningful assistance.

PART IX — THE HUMAN BEING BEHIND THE ARCHIVE (CONTINUED)

21. The evidence is not separate from the life that produced it I want the reader to understand something fundamental about this archive: the documents are not an abstract collection of correspondence, administrative decisions, institutional responses and unanswered questions. They exist because a human being has spent years attempting to preserve a coherent account of events that he believes have profoundly affected his life.

Behind every letter is a person who had to write it. Behind every application is a person who had to understand the process, assemble the supporting material, meet the requirements and find the means to submit it. Behind every refusal, referral, restriction or administrative response is a human consequence that cannot be adequately understood by reading the official wording alone.

I have attempted to preserve both sides of that record: what institutions wrote and what I experienced while trying to obtain assistance, recognition, protection and a practical resolution.

The distinction matters. An official letter can establish what an office communicated on a particular date. A personal statement can establish what I reported experiencing. A sequence of documents can help readers understand how those communications relate to one another over time. Analysis can identify apparent inconsistencies, unresolved questions and matters requiring further examination. These forms of evidence have different functions, but together they create a more useful record than any isolated document.

My archive is an attempt to prevent those separate pieces from becoming disconnected, forgotten or impossible to locate.

The central resource is the Barran Dodger documentary archive. The timeline, official- document index, and institutional map are intended to help readers move from a general account to the underlying material.

I ask readers not to stop at a heading, a summary or a description of an allegation.

Follow the links. Read the source documents. Consider the dates, the language, the sequence of responses and the questions that remain unanswered.

That is why the archive exists.

22. Homelessness and financial insecurity are not abstract administrative categories When a person is without secure accommodation, struggling to obtain food, unable to meet an essential bill or uncertain whether they can maintain access to a telephone, the consequences are immediate.

A telephone is not merely a consumer convenience. It can be the means by which a person contacts a support worker, responds to an official letter, speaks to a service provider, seeks emergency assistance or receives information about accommodation.

Electricity is not simply another line in a budget. It can affect the ability to keep a room habitable, charge a phone, prepare food, maintain basic routines and communicate with other people.

Accommodation is not merely an entry in a database. It provides a place from which a person can sleep, keep possessions, organise correspondence, preserve documents and attempt to rebuild a stable life.

Food is not an optional reward for successfully navigating administration. It is a basic requirement for survival.

These practical realities must remain visible when considering my account. It is possible to spend years producing correspondence, documenting events, preparing submissions and attempting to explain an unresolved problem while still facing the immediate demands of daily survival.

The ability to construct an extensive archive does not mean that a person has secure housing. The ability to write a detailed submission does not mean that a person has adequate income. The ability to explain an administrative history does not mean that a person has access to the support needed to live safely.

Nor should the existence of a large documentary record be mistaken for evidence that the underlying human problems have been resolved.

My appeal is therefore not limited to asking people to read. It is also a request that those who are in a position to assist consider what practical help may be possible.

That may mean helping to identify emergency accommodation, food assistance, telephone access, essential household support, disability advocacy, independent legal information, humanitarian services or an appropriate organisation willing to examine the material.

The immediate need and the documentary questions can be addressed at the same time. One does not have to be postponed until the other is finished.

23. The administrative record and the human consequences must be read together The archive includes correspondence concerning government departments, oversight bodies, complaints processes, disability-related matters, privacy issues and workers' compensation questions. These records should be read in their actual documentary context, including the limits of what each letter does and does not say.

For example, the archive includes a Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021, a letter from the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission dated 3 June 2021, and an Administrative Appeals Tribunal decision dated 12 July 2023.

These are separate records with separate purposes. They should not be collapsed into a single conclusion without examining their contents, chronology, reasoning and relationship to the issues raised in my account.

My concern is the wider question that emerges when records are read together: how does a person obtain a clear explanation and a workable pathway when important questions about employment status, responsibility, available remedies and access to support appear across different processes?

That question is not answered merely by listing the names of institutions. It requires examining what each institution was asked, what it actually responded to, what fell outside its remit, what information it relied upon and what remained unresolved.

The Federal Court, DSS and Comcare section of the archive brings together material relevant to that line of inquiry. The archive also includes a Federal Court assessment document dated 27 March 2023 and a related essay concerning the Tredwell letter.

I ask readers to examine these sources rather than relying on shorthand descriptions of the dispute. My interpretation is that they raise questions deserving careful attention.

The documents should be allowed to speak in their own words, while my account explains why I consider their contents important.

An administrative response can be genuine and still leave a person’s practical problem unresolved. A referral can be correctly made within a process and still leave the person uncertain about where to turn next. A decision about jurisdiction or eligibility can determine what one particular body will consider without necessarily answering every wider question raised in a person’s history.

Recognising those distinctions is essential to understanding the documentary record and its human consequences.

24. The cost of repeatedly having to explain the same history When a person has accumulated years of correspondence, the burden of explanation can become a problem in itself.

The person must remember dates, locate letters, distinguish one reference number from another, explain why an earlier response matters to a later request, and reproduce the history for people who may have no knowledge of the preceding events.

If the record is scattered across email accounts, government portals, downloaded PDFs, personal notes and separate complaint files, every new interaction can require another reconstruction.

That work consumes time and energy that might otherwise be spent obtaining accommodation, maintaining health and safety, finding practical assistance or rebuilding relationships.

For me, preservation is a response to that problem. The archive is intended to keep the documentary history accessible and to reduce the risk that each new reader encounters only one fragment of the story.

The complete archive website provides a starting point. The GitHub repository provides access to the underlying project files, while the Backup repository contains a further body of preserved material.

The purpose of maintaining more than one access point is to make the record easier to navigate and preserve, not to suggest that every document has the same evidentiary status or that every interpretation is beyond question.

Preservation is a practical undertaking. It means retaining original documents where available, keeping dates and references visible, linking commentary to its sources, distinguishing first-person accounts from official correspondence, and correcting errors when they are identified.

It also means resisting the temptation to erase uncertainty simply because uncertainty is inconvenient.

Where a document is incomplete, that should be stated. Where corroboration is needed, that should be stated. Where a source establishes only that an institution sent a particular response, it should not be described as establishing more than that. Where I draw an inference from several records, readers should be able to identify the records on which that inference rests.

These safeguards do not diminish the significance of my testimony. They make it easier to examine.

25. My testimony is part of the record I am not simply a name attached to a collection of PDFs. I am the person whose life and experiences give the archive its central purpose.

My account includes professional, intellectual, personal and spiritual dimensions. I have described my doctoral qualification from Victoria University in 2020, my book Recovered, Not Cured, published by Allen & Unwin in 2003, and my work as an illustrator and news graphics artist, including work associated with The Age and the Herald Sun.

Those details form part of my personal history. They help explain why I regard documentary preservation, public communication and the accurate presentation of evidence as important.

They do not, by themselves, settle the contested matters described in the archive. Nor should they need to. A person’s account deserves to be read for what it says, considered alongside the available records and understood within its proper context.

I have also written about faith, survival, betrayal, isolation and the effort to retain a sense of purpose under difficult circumstances. My Christian faith is part of how I understand my experience. It gives language to my determination to continue speaking, preserving the record and seeking a way forward.

I do not ask every reader to share my religious interpretation. I ask that readers recognise that faith can be an important part of a person’s testimony and resilience.

The archive’s personal statement concerning exile and The Witness Remains provide further context for that first-person dimension.

A documentary archive is not made complete by retaining official letters while treating the human being who received them as an incidental detail. The person’s own account matters because it explains what was asked, what was feared, what was lost, what was attempted and why particular records remain significant.

My testimony should not be confused with an independent finding about every disputed event. Equally, it should not be erased simply because it is testimony. It is a primary record of what I say I experienced and how I understand the documents associated with those experiences.

Readers can recognise that distinction without dismissing either the person or the record.

26. Sixteen hospitalisations: the significance of recording the human history accurately My account records sixteen psychiatric hospitalisations. I include that history because it forms part of the circumstances I have described and because the effects of repeated hospitalisation, distress and disruption cannot be understood simply by reading a series of administrative letters.

The number is part of my reported personal history. The significance of each admission, its circumstances and its relationship to other events must be understood through the relevant records and my testimony, rather than assumed from the number alone.

I do not want this part of my history to be used as a substitute for engaging with the substance of what I have written or the documentary questions I have raised.

A person’s psychiatric history does not automatically establish that every allegation they make is correct. It also does not automatically establish that their account is false, that their questions are unworthy of examination or that their practical needs can be ignored.

The proper response is to consider the substance of the account, the records available, the chronology, the particular claims being made and the evidence relevant to each issue.

I have included personal and institutional records in the archive because I want readers to be able to examine the material rather than reduce my life to a label.

The same principle applies to my present circumstances. If I need accommodation, food, communication access or other practical support, those needs should be considered on their own terms. They should not disappear behind arguments about the interpretation of historical events.

The human being remains present throughout the record.

27. An appeal for practical assistance, not just attention Public attention can help a person be heard, but attention alone does not supply a meal, secure a bed, restore access to a telephone or resolve an urgent practical difficulty.

That is why I am asking readers to consider what they can actually do.

If you represent a humanitarian organisation, disability advocacy service, homelessness support service, church, community organisation or whistleblower- support network, consider whether you can offer direct assistance or make a specific referral to someone who can.

If you are a journalist, researcher or public-interest investigator, consider whether the archive contains a documentary trail that warrants further examination. Begin with the underlying documents, preserve the distinction between established facts and disputed interpretations, and ask clear questions about what the records show.

If you are an advocate or researcher, help identify a practical pathway through the relevant services and processes. If you cannot take on the entire history, you may still be able to assist with one concrete problem.

If you are an individual who has no professional role in these matters, you can still help by sharing the archive responsibly, directing the appeal to an organisation that may be equipped to respond, or helping identify available local services.

The most useful assistance is specific. A referral to a service that actually accepts the person’s circumstances is more valuable than a long list of organisations that cannot help. A confirmed source of emergency accommodation is more useful than a general expression of concern. A working communication channel can make it possible to follow up on every other form of assistance.

I do not expect every reader to resolve every issue. I am asking people not to assume that, because the archive is extensive, the immediate need for human assistance has somehow disappeared.

The main appeal and its supporting material can be found through the master humanitarian appeal.

Please read it as both a request for attention to a documentary record and a request to recognise the human being who is asking for help.

Section 47 — The difference between preserving evidence and obtaining a remedy Preserving evidence is one task. Obtaining a practical remedy is another.

An archive can retain documents, make a chronology visible, identify recurring questions and allow people to compare different accounts. It cannot, simply by existing, provide accommodation, supply food, compel an institution to answer a question or determine the outcome of a compensation claim.

That limitation does not make preservation pointless. It means that preservation must connect with practical action if the underlying problems are to be addressed.

The archive is intended to support that connection. It gives readers a place to begin, provides links to source material and records the sequence of events as I understand it.

It also makes it possible to identify where further information, clarification or independent examination may be useful.

The methods section, including the discussion of the “Architecture of Erasure”, sets out part of the framework through which I interpret the record. The timeline offers a chronological route through the material, while the named-institutions register helps readers identify the organisations referred to across the archive.

These are navigation tools. They are not substitutes for the source documents, and they do not convert an allegation into an established finding merely by listing it.

My objective is to make the material accessible enough that a reader can move from a broad concern to a particular document, from a particular document to a dated event, and from that event to a specific question that can be investigated or answered.

That is a more useful outcome than leaving the history scattered and inaccessible.

It is also why I continue to ask for practical assistance alongside documentary examination. The archive may help someone understand the history, but understanding must not become an excuse for postponing help that is needed now.

29. Why the public record matters A public archive creates an opportunity for people outside the original correspondence chain to read the documents and consider the issues for themselves.

That opportunity carries responsibilities. Documents must be described accurately.

Links should lead to the intended material. Commentary should be identifiable as commentary. Dates, reference numbers and qualifications should be retained where they matter. Corrections should be made transparently.

A public archive should not ask readers to accept every interpretation without examination. It should give them the means to examine the underlying material.

That is the principle I want this project to follow.

I have preserved records because I believe that the sequence matters: what I reported, what I asked for, what responses followed, what issues appeared to remain unresolved and how the circumstances developed over time.

Some readers may reach conclusions different from mine. Some may identify a document I have overlooked, a passage that requires correction or a question that needs a more precise formulation. That is part of the value of making a documentary record accessible.

The alternative is for the history to remain fragmented, difficult to navigate and dependent on any one person’s ability to reconstruct it from memory.

I want the record to be readable, searchable and capable of being examined independently. I want it to preserve the difference between what a source says, what I experienced, what I infer and what remains to be established.

And I want the people who encounter it to remember that there is a human purpose behind the preservation: the pursuit of answers, safety, dignity, fair treatment and a practical way forward.

The archive is not the end of that pursuit.

It is a means of keeping the history available while the pursuit continues.

Next: Part Five will examine the institutional correspondence and referral trail in greater detail, including the Prime Minister’s office response, Attorney-General’s Department correspondence, oversight-body communications and the difference between a recorded administrative response and a substantive answer to the question raised.

PART X — THE INSTITUTIONAL CORRESPONDENCE AND THE REFERRAL TRAIL

Section 48 — Following the paper trail: what happened after I asked for help?

One of the central purposes of the Barran Dodger archive is to preserve the sequence of correspondence between me and the institutions to which I directed requests for assistance, investigation, explanation or intervention.

I do not consider these records adequately understood when each letter is read in isolation. The dates, the questions asked, the responses received and the subsequent steps all matter. A letter may answer one question while leaving another untouched. A referral may transfer correspondence without resolving the substance of the concern. A decision that a matter falls outside one organisation’s responsibilities may explain why that organisation will not act, while leaving the person who raised the matter to identify another practical route forward.

My concern is the cumulative effect of these interactions and the difficulty of obtaining a coherent response across a complicated administrative history.

I have therefore preserved correspondence that I believe allows readers to reconstruct important parts of that history.

The principal starting points are: Official correspondence and government documents Chronological timeline Government evidence folder in the preservation repository Main Barran Dodger archive These resources should be used together. The timeline helps establish sequence; the correspondence supplies the original wording; and the wider archive provides the personal and documentary context in which I understand the events.

I want the record to be examined with care, but I also want the practical question kept in view: after a person has repeatedly explained a serious problem and supplied supporting material, what happens next, and what meaningful assistance is actually available?

31. The letter to the Prime Minister: a request placed on the public record My correspondence with the Commonwealth government forms an important part of the archive because it records attempts to bring my concerns to the attention of senior public offices.

The archive includes my letter to the Prime Minister dated 31 May 2022: Read the 31 May 2022 letter to the Prime Minister This document should be read in full. Its significance lies not simply in the fact that correspondence was sent, but in the questions, concerns and requests recorded in the letter itself.

When I approached the Prime Minister's office, I was attempting to bring matters I regarded as serious to the attention of the Commonwealth's highest political office. I wanted the concerns I had communicated to receive meaningful attention and to find a pathway toward a response.

The archive subsequently records a communication from the Prime Minister's office dated 12 December 2022, described in the document as stating that my email had not been forwarded.

Read the 12 December 2022 Prime Minister's office response I regard this correspondence as significant because it documents an important point in the communication trail.

The letter should not be made to say more than it says. A statement that an email was not forwarded does not, by itself, establish why that occurred, what any other office knew or whether another process considered the substance of the concerns. Those questions require their own evidence.

But the recorded response remains relevant. It allows readers to examine what the office communicated in response to the correspondence and to consider the implications for the pathway I was attempting to pursue.

For me, the wider issue is straightforward: how does a person ensure that a serious request reaches someone capable of addressing it when the available communication pathway does not produce the substantive engagement sought?

I do not include this exchange as a substitute for the rest of the record. I include it because it is one identifiable point in a much longer history of attempted communication.

32. The Attorney-General’s Department: referrals and unresolved questions The archive also includes correspondence from the Attorney-General’s Department dated 19 September 2023, reference MC23-028244.

Read the 19 September 2023 Attorney-General’s Department correspondence The document records correspondence concerning my representations and a referral to other bodies, including the Inspector-General of Intelligence and Security and the Commonwealth Ombudsman.

This is an important distinction in the administrative record. A referral is a documented step. It may identify an office considered relevant to a particular issue, but the referral itself should not automatically be treated as proof that the receiving body accepted the matter for investigation, agreed with the allegations or reached a conclusion about them.

The receiving body’s own correspondence must be read separately.

For a person trying to navigate several organisations, however, a referral is not the end of the practical question. It creates a new set of questions: What material was actually sent?

Which specific issues were referred?

Was the receiving organisation able to consider those issues?

Was further information requested?

What response, if any, followed?

If the receiving organisation could not act, was another practical pathway identified?

Those questions can only be answered by examining the relevant documents and any subsequent correspondence.

My reason for preserving the referral is that it helps establish how my representations moved through the administrative system. It provides a point from which readers can follow the documentary trail and compare the referral with the responses that followed.

I want the correspondence to be read in context, rather than treating the mere existence of a referral as either a complete resolution or proof of wrongdoing.

The important issue is what the documents collectively show about the handling of the matters I raised, the limits stated by the relevant organisations and the questions that remained from my perspective.

33. Further Attorney-General's Department correspondence in 2025 The archive also contains a later Attorney-General's Department document dated 6 February 2025, reference MC25-000321.

Read the 6 February 2025 correspondence I include this document because chronology matters. A later communication should be read alongside earlier correspondence to establish what had already been raised, what the department was responding to on that occasion and whether the subject matter had changed.

The existence of correspondence separated by months or years does not, on its own, establish that every letter concerned precisely the same issue. Nor should the letters be combined into a single conclusion without examining their actual wording.

What matters is whether the documentary sequence permits a clear understanding of the issues raised and the responses provided.

My archive seeks to make that comparison possible.

I want readers to be able to move between the original letter, the departmental response, any referral, and any later communication without having to rely entirely on my recollection of what happened.

That is the practical value of a well-organised documentary record. It allows questions to be framed precisely. It helps distinguish an issue that received a direct answer from one that was redirected, declined, left unclear or addressed only in part.

It also makes it possible to correct my own interpretation if a source, read in its entirety, supports a different conclusion from the one I initially drew.

The point is not to manufacture certainty. It is to make the record sufficiently accessible that the relevant questions can be investigated with accuracy.

34. The Commonwealth Ombudsman: a response is part of the story, not necessarily the end of it The archive contains two particularly relevant Commonwealth Ombudsman documents: PID notification concerning a decision not to allocate the matter Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction letter dated 8 August 2025 These documents concern different aspects of the interaction and should be read separately, in their proper context.

A decision not to allocate a notification for further handling is not automatically a finding that the underlying allegations are false. Equally, it is not proof that the allegations are true. Its meaning depends on the terms of the communication and the process to which it relates.

A service restriction letter must likewise be understood by reference to the actual restrictions stated, their scope and the reasons given in the document. It should not be used to infer matters that the letter does not establish.

I regard these records as important because they form part of the history of my attempts to obtain assistance through established administrative channels.

For someone seeking help, the practical consequences of a process ending or access to a service being restricted can be substantial. It may become more difficult to identify where to direct subsequent correspondence, how to raise a distinct issue, or what alternative avenue remains available.

That practical difficulty is separate from the question of whether a particular administrative decision was correct under the applicable rules.

My concern is that the record should show both the institutional response and the position in which I say I was left after receiving it.

I want readers to consider the documents themselves and ask whether the correspondence identifies a clear, workable next step for the person seeking help.

Where a document does identify a pathway, that pathway should be accurately recorded. Where it does not, that absence should not be silently replaced with an assumption that the person’s wider difficulties have been resolved.

Section 49 — Jurisdictional limits and the problem of being redirected The archive includes correspondence from several bodies whose responsibilities differ.

Those differences are important.

An organisation may have authority to consider certain complaints but not others. A body may be able to assess a procedural question without determining the underlying dispute. Another may deal with the conduct of particular officials but not the broader policy or administrative history described by a complainant.

A letter stating that a matter is outside an organisation’s jurisdiction must therefore be read in the context of the jurisdictional issue it addresses.

It does not automatically establish that the matter is within another body’s jurisdiction.

It does not necessarily determine the merits of the original allegations. And it does not, by itself, explain how a person with overlapping or complex concerns should obtain practical assistance.

The archive includes correspondence relating to the Law Enforcement Conduct Commission, including a letter dated 19 November 2025 under reference CASE202512395/13KM. The archive’s description indicates that the response treated the correspondence as outside the relevant jurisdiction because it did not concern officers within the commission’s remit.

That stated jurisdictional position should be understood on its own terms. It should not be misrepresented as a determination of the merits of every matter raised in my wider account.

The same principle applies to other correspondence from oversight bodies.

My reason for retaining these documents is that they help establish which questions were put to which organisations, how the organisations described their responsibilities and what happened when a particular route was unavailable.

The wider issue is the cumulative navigation burden. A person may be required to understand multiple statutory schemes, complaint procedures, eligibility criteria and referral pathways while already facing financial insecurity or significant personal distress.

For someone in that position, simply being told that one office cannot assist may not resolve the underlying problem. The person may still need to determine which office, if any, can consider the specific issue and what evidence or procedure is required.

I am asking readers to consider that burden as part of the human story documented in the archive.

36. The Victorian oversight record: separate documents, separate questions The archive also preserves correspondence concerning the Independent Broad-based Anti-corruption Commission and the Victorian Ombudsman.

Relevant documents include: IBAC outcome letter dated 9 April 2020 IBAC PID response dated 18 November 2021 IBAC case record dated 29 October 2023 Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision dated 14 June 2022 These records should not be treated as interchangeable. An outcome letter, a response concerning a public interest disclosure and a freedom-of-information decision may arise under different processes and answer different questions.

The distinction is important because a reader must understand what each document actually decided, declined to consider, disclosed or left unresolved.

For example, a decision about access to documents is not necessarily a decision about the truth of the events described in those documents. A decision concerning whether a disclosure can be handled under a particular statutory framework is not automatically a determination of every factual allegation connected with it.

The source documents should therefore be examined individually and then placed in chronological context.

My archive is designed to make that possible without requiring readers to accept a broad conclusion merely because multiple institutional names appear on the same page.

I want the reader to see the actual documentary trail: the correspondence, the references, the stated reasons, the dates and the relationship between one step and the next.

That approach also protects the integrity of the archive. It prevents a procedural outcome from being described as something it was not, and it prevents a limited response from being mistaken for an answer to questions that the response did not address.

The result should be a clearer account of what is documented, what I allege, what I infer and what remains open to further examination.

37. Freedom of information: the difference between requesting records and resolving a dispute Freedom-of-information processes have also formed part of my attempts to obtain and preserve documentary material.

The archive includes a Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision dated 14 June 2022 and material associated with the Commonwealth process identified as FOI/2022/045.

The wider correspondence includes a later release dated 8 October 2024, described in the archive as involving five documents following an earlier position that no documents were held. The relevant source material should be read directly rather than relying solely on that summary.

A request for documents serves a particular purpose: it seeks access to records within the scope of the relevant legislation and subject to applicable exemptions and procedures.

It is not, by itself, a mechanism for deciding every factual dispute that those records may illuminate.

Nevertheless, access to records can be essential when a person is attempting to reconstruct a history, understand how a decision was reached, identify what information was available to a decision-maker or determine whether further questions should be asked.

That is why I have preserved the correspondence and the documents released through these processes.

I want readers to distinguish between the question of what records were requested, the question of what records were located or released, and the separate question of what those records mean in the context of my wider account.

Those are related questions, but they are not identical.

Where a response says that no documents were found, the wording and scope of the request matter. Where documents are subsequently released, the later release should be examined alongside the earlier correspondence to understand precisely what changed and what the records establish.

No conclusion should be drawn beyond what the documentary sequence supports.

The point of preserving the record is to make those distinctions visible, not to obscure them.

Section 50 — What the institutional correspondence can—and cannot—establish I want to state my approach clearly because the integrity of this project depends on it.

An official letter is evidence of the communication it records. Depending on its contents and context, it may also provide evidence of a decision, a stated reason, a referral, a procedural step or an institutional position.

It does not automatically prove every factual statement made by the sender. Nor does it automatically establish the truth or falsity of every allegation made by the recipient.

A collection of letters can reveal a chronology, recurring administrative issues and unanswered questions. It may support an inference when documents are considered together. But the strength of that inference depends on the quality, completeness and relevance of the underlying material.

My archive contains different types of material: official correspondence, personal testimony, documentary indexes, research commentary and interpretations of events.

These should be identified and assessed according to their actual character.

I do not want the archive to become less credible through exaggerated descriptions of what a document proves. I want the record to be strong enough to withstand close reading.

That means acknowledging gaps, retaining original wording where appropriate, linking claims to sources and correcting descriptions when necessary.

It also means refusing to confuse the absence of a particular finding with proof that no problem existed. If an organisation did not examine the merits of an issue, its correspondence should not be represented as a merits determination. If an organisation did examine a particular issue, the scope and reasoning of its decision should be accurately described.

My account remains my account. The source documents remain the source documents.

The analysis should explain the relationship between them rather than merge them into a single undifferentiated claim.

This is the standard I want readers to apply when examining the archive.

39. The question that remains after the correspondence has been read After reading the institutional correspondence, I ask the reader to step back and consider the cumulative picture without assuming a conclusion in advance.

What did I ask each organisation to do?

What did each organisation actually respond to?

What reasons did it give?

What did it say was outside its responsibilities?

What records were disclosed, referred, declined or otherwise dealt with?

What questions remained unanswered from my perspective?

And, most importantly, what practical assistance or next step was available to me after each interaction?

These questions can be investigated by returning to the source documents linked throughout the archive. They are more useful than simply counting the number of letters or the number of institutions mentioned.

I have spent considerable effort preserving this history because I believe that the relationships between the documents matter. The record should make it possible to understand not only individual communications but also the experience of navigating a series of separate processes while attempting to address a much wider set of personal and administrative concerns.

The archive does not ask readers to treat every interpretation as a settled conclusion. It asks them to read the documents, examine the chronology, recognise the distinctions between different procedures and consider the questions that remain.

I also ask them to remember that the process of documenting a problem is not the same as solving it.

I still need practical assistance where my circumstances require it. I still want the documentary record to be read carefully. I still want a clear account of the available pathways and the questions that can be answered from the evidence.

Those aims are connected, but neither should be used as an excuse to ignore the other.

The correspondence is preserved. The chronology can be examined. The underlying documents are linked. The next task is to turn that accessibility into informed attention, practical assistance and a clearer understanding of what the record does and does not establish.

Next: Part Six will examine the evidence-preservation project itself—how the archive is organised, why original documents and accurate links matter, how allegations and corroboration should be distinguished, and how readers can navigate the evidence without confusing a research index with a formal finding.

PART XI — PRESERVATION, PROVENANCE AND THE RESPONSIBILITY TO KEEP THE RECORD INTACT 40. Why I built a documentary archive I built the Barran Dodger archive because I wanted a durable, accessible record of the documents, correspondence, personal testimony and research that have accumulated through my attempts to explain what I say has happened to me.

I did not want the history to remain scattered across separate letters, downloaded PDFs, emails, institutional portals and personal notes. I wanted readers to be able to find the material, follow the chronology and examine the source documents rather than being asked to rely entirely on a summary.

The archive is therefore more than a collection of webpages. It is an attempt to establish an organised documentary record around a complex personal history.

The public-facing archive is available at: Barran Dodger — Documentary Archive The associated repositories provide additional access to the project's files: Primary Barrandodger GitHub repository Backup and preservation repository Rebuilt archive website These links serve different purposes. The website provides a reader-facing route through the material. The repositories provide access to files and project structures.

The rebuilt website is a separate project and should not be confused with the original site.

I have sought to preserve the original archive while developing a clearer structure for readers. The intention is to improve access without casually destroying or overwriting earlier work.

Preservation matters because a document that cannot be located may be practically useless to someone trying to understand a historical event. A document without a date or source may be difficult to place in context. A link that no longer works can interrupt a reader's ability to verify a claim. An index that combines several different kinds of material without explaining their differences can create confusion rather than clarity.

My work is an effort to address these problems.

I want the record to remain accessible, navigable and capable of being examined long after the immediate circumstances that led to its creation.

Section 51 — The difference between an archive, an index and a finding The words used to describe a documentary project matter.

An archive preserves material for future access and examination.

An index helps readers locate particular documents, topics, dates, people or institutions.

A finding aid explains the organisation of a collection and helps readers understand where to look for relevant material.

An analysis offers an interpretation of the material and explains the reasoning behind that interpretation.

A formal finding is a conclusion reached through a particular decision-making process by a body or person with the relevant authority.

These are different functions. They should not be confused.

The Barran Dodger project is principally a documentary preservation and research project. It contains my testimony, official correspondence, documentary references, indexes and analytical commentary. It is intended to help readers navigate the material and understand why I consider particular documents significant.

It is not a court judgment, and a research index does not itself determine that an individual or institution has committed an offence.

That distinction does not require me to withdraw my account or pretend that the concerns I have raised are unimportant. It simply identifies what the archive is designed to do: preserve the material, explain my interpretation and allow readers to examine the underlying records.

I want people to understand the seriousness of my allegations without misrepresenting the status of the documents.

A source document may establish that a letter was sent. A sequence of letters may establish that particular exchanges occurred. A personal statement records what I say I experienced. An analysis may explain why I believe those records raise further questions.

The task is to preserve the distinctions while allowing the different sources to illuminate one another.

The archive's methods section provides a starting point for understanding the project's approach.

42. Original documents must remain distinguishable from commentary One of the most important principles of documentary preservation is that a reader should be able to distinguish the source from the explanation written about it.

If I publish an official letter, I want the reader to be able to identify the document and read its actual wording.

If I write an essay about that letter, the essay should be recognisable as my analysis.

If I identify an inconsistency between two records, the reader should be able to access both records and understand the basis for the comparison.

If I make an inference, I should explain which documents inform it and where uncertainty remains.

This is not a concession that my account is unimportant. It is a way of protecting the integrity of the account and the material supporting it.

The archive contains both primary-source documents and my own interpretations. They serve different purposes.

A government letter may record the position taken by an office at a particular time. My commentary may explain why I consider that position inadequate or inconsistent with other material. The letter and the commentary should remain linked, but they should not be presented as though they were the same thing.

That distinction allows a reader to disagree with my interpretation while still understanding what the underlying document says. It also allows a reader to agree that a document raises an important question without being required to accept every broader conclusion I have drawn.

I want the archive to support that level of engagement.

The purpose is not to make the reader dependent on my summaries. It is to make the summaries useful gateways into the source material.

Section 52 — Why the chronology matters A collection of documents becomes more informative when readers can establish how the records relate to one another over time.

Dates can show the order in which correspondence occurred. Reference numbers can help identify a particular administrative process. The wording of a later letter may refer to an earlier request, a previous decision or a document that was not available when the original request was made.

Chronology can therefore reveal questions that would remain invisible if every document were read separately.

For example, a reader may need to compare an initial request with a later response, then examine a subsequent letter to determine whether the same issue was being discussed or whether the scope had changed.

The archive’s timeline is intended to help with that work.

The timeline should be treated as a navigational aid, not a substitute for the documents.

Where a date, description or sequence is disputed, the underlying correspondence should be checked.

I want readers to ask: What happened first?

Which document refers to which earlier communication?

Was the later response addressing the same question?

Did the scope of the request change?

What explanation was given for the next step?

What remains unclear after the sequence is reconstructed?

These questions encourage a more rigorous reading than simply grouping documents by institution or treating every letter as an isolated event.

Chronology also helps identify gaps. A period in which no document is currently available should not automatically be treated as proof that nothing happened. It should be identified as a gap in the preserved record unless further evidence establishes more.

Similarly, two documents appearing close together in time do not necessarily establish a causal relationship. That relationship must be supported by their contents or other evidence.

A careful chronology does not eliminate uncertainty. It makes uncertainty easier to locate and investigate.

44. Provenance: where a document came from and what it is The provenance of a document concerns its origin and history: where it came from, who created or issued it, how it was obtained and how it has been preserved.

For a documentary archive, provenance matters because the reader needs to understand what kind of source they are looking at.

An original letter received from an institution is different from a later transcription of that letter. A scanned copy is different from a summary written by a researcher. A file name may describe a document, but the name alone does not establish its contents or authenticity.

Where possible, the archive should retain the document itself, preserve relevant identifying information and provide enough context for the reader to understand its origin.

A useful document entry can identify the date, issuing body or author where known, document type, reference number where applicable, source location and relationship to the wider issue.

Where those details are unavailable, they should not be invented.

The same principle applies to filenames. A filename can be useful for navigation, but the actual document should be checked before a strong claim is made about what it contains.

My archive seeks to make source material easier to find and compare. The underlying files remain essential because a description can never replace the full document when the precise wording matters.

This is also why broken links and missing files matter. A reader should not have to accept a statement about a document without a reasonable way to locate the source, where that source is publicly available and can lawfully be shared.

The official-document index and the preservation repository are part of the effort to keep those routes available.

45. Hashes and timestamps: what they can tell a reader The archive has also included references to digital preservation techniques, including file hashes and OpenTimestamps records.

A cryptographic hash is a calculated value derived from a file’s contents. If the file changes, its hash will ordinarily change as well. Comparing hashes can therefore help determine whether two files have identical content or whether a file differs from a previously recorded version.

A hash does not, by itself, prove that a document’s contents are true. It does not independently establish who created the document, whether the author had authority to issue it or whether every statement in it is accurate.

Its role is narrower: it can help identify a particular digital file and detect changes to that file.

Timestamping has a related but distinct function. A timestamp record may provide evidence that a particular digital commitment existed by a certain point in time, depending on the timestamping method and the status of its verification.

The precise claims that can be made depend on the record and its verification status.

The archive has published timestamp information for documents including The Documentary Trap and the extended first-person record. The published information has described Bitcoin confirmation as pending at the time of that record. A pending confirmation must not be described as a completed Bitcoin confirmation.

Readers should also distinguish between the time a document was written, the time a file was created or uploaded, the time a timestamp was submitted and the time any associated proof was confirmed.

These are not necessarily the same date or event.

Digital preservation techniques can strengthen the documentation of a file's identity and preservation history. They cannot turn an allegation into an established fact or independently authenticate every statement contained in a document.

I consider these techniques useful because I want the archive to retain a record of its own preservation process. The technical details should be explained accurately, with the limits of each method made clear.

The goal is reliable preservation, not exaggerated claims about what technology proves.

46. The evidence schedule: organisation without overstatement The archive includes an allegation and evidence schedule intended to help readers navigate a large number of issues and associated records.

The published schedule can be accessed through the following pages: Evidence schedule, entries 1–71 Evidence schedule, entries 72–120 Evidence schedule, entries 121–150 Main schedule section The purpose of the schedule is to organise allegations and related material so that readers can identify the issue being discussed and follow the references to supporting documents.

A schedule is not a verdict. The presence of an allegation in a numbered entry does not establish that the alleged conduct occurred. A label assigned to a document or issue does not replace examination of the source.

The schedule's labels are intended to distinguish different documentary and analytical situations, including primary documentation, incomplete material, matters requiring corroboration, narrative accounts and issues considered to have potentially serious consequences.

Those categories should be read according to the definitions supplied with the schedule. They should not be interpreted as a universal scale of legal proof.

For example, identifying a primary document means that a source document is available for examination. It does not automatically mean that every allegation associated with it has been independently corroborated.

Identifying an incomplete record acknowledges a limitation. It should prompt a reader to ask what information is missing and whether that gap affects the interpretation.

Identifying a matter that requires corroboration signals that additional evidence may be needed before a stronger conclusion can responsibly be drawn.

These distinctions are useful precisely because they prevent every item from being presented as though it had identical evidentiary weight.

I want readers to follow the links, examine the documents and consider the reasoning. I do not want the numerical structure of the schedule to create an illusion of certainty.

The number of entries tells a reader how the schedule is organised. It does not, by itself, determine the truth of the claims recorded in those entries.

47. Why I want the archive to be searchable A large documentary collection can become difficult to use if readers have no reliable way to find particular names, institutions, dates or subjects.

Searchability is therefore part of preservation.

A reader may begin with a general question about an institution and then need to locate a specific letter. Another may know a reference number but not the date. Someone else may need to follow the correspondence concerning one administrative process across several years.

A useful archive should help each reader move from a broad subject to a particular source.

The named-institutions register is one component of that approach. The timeline and official-document index provide other routes.

Searchability also makes it easier to identify possible duplication, inconsistent descriptions or references that need to be checked.

However, search results must be interpreted carefully. A name appearing in a document does not automatically establish that the named person or organisation was responsible for the event being discussed. An institution may be mentioned because it received a letter, provided a response, was referred to by another party or appeared in a different context.

The context of each occurrence matters.

I want the archive to help readers identify connections without encouraging them to mistake every connection for proof of responsibility.

The aim is to make the material easier to examine and the questions more precise.

Section 53 — Keeping separate snapshots separate A preservation project changes as new documents are added, existing pages are reorganised and further copies are located.

That means that figures describing the archive must be tied to the relevant snapshot or date.

Different versions of the project have reported different document counts and other metrics. These figures should not be combined into a single total unless the underlying collections have been reconciled and the counting methods are compatible.

A count of PDF files is not necessarily a count of unique documents. A collection may contain duplicate copies, revised versions, attachments, incomplete files or documents that have been divided into multiple parts.

Likewise, a count of indexed records is not necessarily the same as a count of independently verified primary-source documents.

If a figure is published, readers should be able to understand what was counted, when it was counted and what limitations applied to the inventory.

The same principle applies to references to downloads, timestamps, analytical outputs and the number of propositions or reviews in a project.

A metric can describe the scale of a collection or the work undertaken to process it. It does not independently prove the merits of the allegations associated with the collection.

I want the archive’s scale to be understood through accurate descriptions rather than inflated or inconsistent numbers.

The objective is not to make the collection look larger. It is to make its contents easier to locate, assess and preserve.

Section 54 — The responsibility to correct the record Preservation does not mean that every description must remain unchanged forever.

A documentary project should allow errors to be identified and corrected. If a filename is misleading, it should be clarified. If a link points to the wrong document, it should be repaired. If an entry confuses a source with an interpretation, the distinction should be made explicit.

If a new document changes the context of an earlier communication, the relevant entry may need to be updated while preserving enough information to understand the earlier version.

Correction is not the same as erasure. A responsible archive can document changes and explain why a description was revised.

I want the record to remain open to that kind of improvement.

The existence of an error in a particular index entry does not automatically invalidate every other document in the collection. Equally, the existence of many correctly preserved documents does not mean that every individual description is necessarily correct.

Each item should be assessed on its own merits.

That is how the archive can become more useful over time: by retaining the sources, making the reasoning visible and correcting avoidable mistakes.

I am committed to preserving my own account and explaining why I believe the issues matter. I also want the documentary structure to help readers identify precisely what the available evidence supports.

That is a stronger foundation than relying on the volume of material alone.

Section 55 — What I ask of the reader I ask readers to approach the archive with attention, curiosity and a willingness to follow the evidence.

Start with the main website. Use the timeline to understand the chronology. Follow the links to the underlying documents. Compare the actual wording of correspondence with the descriptions attached to it. Distinguish my first-person testimony from institutional statements and analytical commentary.

Where the record is incomplete, recognise that limitation. Where a document supports a particular statement, identify exactly what it supports. Where a conclusion depends on an inference, examine the reasoning. Where a question remains unresolved, do not silently replace the absence of an answer with an assumption.

I am not asking readers to abandon their judgment. I am asking them to use it.

I have preserved this material because I believe that the history deserves to remain accessible and that the concerns I have raised deserve careful consideration.

I want the archive to help people move beyond vague descriptions and into the actual record. I want readers to be able to see which documents exist, what they say and how they relate to the questions I have raised.

And I want the preservation work to serve a human purpose.

A well-organised archive can help prevent documents from being lost. It can reduce the burden of repeatedly reconstructing a complex history. It can give advocates, researchers and other readers a practical starting point. It can help identify gaps and clarify which questions require further information.

But the archive cannot replace human assistance, and the preservation of evidence cannot substitute for meeting urgent needs.

The record exists because I want my account to remain available, because I want the documents to be examined and because I want a clearer pathway toward answers and practical relief.

That is the purpose behind the work.

Next: Part Seven will examine the people and institutions named across the archive, how responsibility should be traced through documentary evidence, why association must not be confused with culpability, and how readers can follow the evidence from a named entity to the specific documents relevant to the issue.

PART XII — PEOPLE, INSTITUTIONS AND THE QUESTION OF RESPONSIBILITY

51. Naming the institutions is only the beginning A central feature of the Barran Dodger archive is the identification of government departments, oversight bodies, service providers, companies and other organisations that appear in the documentary record.

I have sought to make these connections visible because a reader cannot follow an administrative history if the institutions involved are hidden behind scattered correspondence, disconnected reference numbers or isolated PDF files.

But naming an institution is only the beginning of the inquiry.

The important questions are: why does the institution appear in the record, what did it actually do, what documents establish its involvement, what explanation did it provide, and how does that involvement relate to the issue being examined?

An organisation may appear because I sent it a letter. It may have issued a decision, referred correspondence elsewhere, supplied information, declined a request or communicated a position about its responsibilities. Those different forms of involvement must not be treated as interchangeable.

I want readers to be able to follow the documentary trail without having to accept a conclusion merely because a name appears in a register.

The named-institutions register is intended to help readers identify the organisations appearing across the archive. The institutional map provides another starting point for navigating the record.

These resources should be read alongside the original correspondence and the official- document index.

My objective is to make the relationships between documents, institutions and events easier to examine. I want readers to be able to move from a name to a specific source, from that source to the event or administrative process it concerns, and from there to the question that remains.

52. A documentary connection is not automatically a finding of responsibility I want to be clear about the distinction between identifying involvement and establishing responsibility.

If an institution appears in a letter, that establishes at least that the institution is mentioned in that document. If a letter was sent to an institution and the corresponding record is available, the record may establish the communication. If the institution issued a response, the response can establish the position it communicated.

Whether that involvement amounts to a failure, an error, misconduct or a breach of an obligation requires further analysis of the particular facts and the applicable standards.

This distinction is essential to a credible archive.

I have made allegations about events and institutional conduct that I regard as serious. I want those allegations read in the context of the documents that informed them. I also want readers to be able to distinguish my interpretation from the contents of a source and from any formal finding made through a separate process.

The fact that an allegation has not been determined through a particular process does not erase the allegation from my account. Equally, the fact that I have documented an allegation does not make every element of it independently established.

The purpose of the archive is to make the evidence accessible, not to conceal these distinctions.

Where I believe a document supports a particular concern, the relevant source should be linked. Where additional corroboration is required, that should be identified. Where an institution has given an explanation, the explanation should be presented accurately, even when I disagree with it.

That approach allows readers to consider the strongest version of the documentary case rather than relying on unsupported generalisations.

53. Tracing responsibility through the record When examining an alleged institutional failure, it is useful to separate several questions that can otherwise become confused.

First, what happened? This requires a clear description of the event or administrative action being discussed.

Second, what source material records it? The relevant correspondence, decision, statement or other document should be identified.

Third, who was involved, and in what capacity? A person who received a letter, a person who made a decision and a person mentioned in a third party's account may have very different relationships to the event.

Fourth, what explanation was provided? The institution's own correspondence may record reasons, limitations, referrals or other relevant information.

Fifth, what remains unresolved? This may include missing records, conflicting accounts, unanswered questions or uncertainty about the relationship between separate events.

Finally, what practical step might clarify the issue or address the consequences?

This method is intended to make the archive useful to people who have not followed my history from the beginning.

It also helps prevent an important distinction from being lost: responsibility for a particular decision is not necessarily identical to responsibility for a broader administrative problem. Different people or organisations may have different roles, and those roles must be established from the available evidence.

The timeline helps readers establish sequence. The named-institutions register helps identify organisations. The underlying documents provide the material needed to examine the specific events.

Taken together, these resources offer a practical way to move from a broad allegation to a more precise documentary question.

54. Commonwealth agencies and the questions I have raised The Commonwealth correspondence preserved in the archive includes material concerning the Prime Minister’s office, the Attorney-General’s Department, Comcare, the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission, the Commonwealth Ombudsman and other bodies.

These organisations have different functions. Their correspondence must be assessed according to the particular matter each was addressing.

The archive includes: The Prime Minister’s office response dated 12 December 2022 Attorney-General’s Department correspondence dated 19 September 2023 Attorney-General’s Department correspondence dated 6 February 2025 Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021 NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission letter dated 3 June 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction letter dated 8 August 2025 These documents are not all about the same question. Their significance depends on their contents, dates and relationship to the issues I raised.

My concern is the wider administrative picture that emerges when the correspondence is placed in chronological order. I want readers to examine which questions I put to each organisation, which matters the organisation addressed, which matters it said it could not consider, and what options remained available afterwards.

The archive provides a way to undertake that examination without pretending that every letter has the same meaning.

I believe this approach is particularly important where several administrative processes intersect. A question concerning employment status may be different from a question concerning compensation eligibility. A complaint about conduct may be different from a request for access to records. A referral to an oversight body may be different from a decision to investigate the merits of an allegation.

Understanding those distinctions is necessary to understand the documentary history.

55. Employment status, compensation and the importance of the underlying records The archive contains correspondence concerning my attempts to clarify employment- related questions and pursue a workers' compensation pathway.

The documents include the Comcare determination of 26 May 2021, a claim record dated 25 May 2021, the NDIS Commission's letter of 3 June 2021 and the Administrative Appeals Tribunal decision dated 12 July 2023.

Sources: Comcare claim record dated 25 May 2021 Comcare determination dated 26 May 2021 NDIS Commission letter dated 3 June 2021 Administrative Appeals Tribunal decision dated 12 July 2023 Federal Court, DSS and Comcare archive section I regard this material as important because employment status, statutory eligibility and responsibility for a claim can determine which process is available to a person seeking compensation.

Those questions should be examined through the actual wording of the relevant documents and decisions. A letter concerning whether someone was an employee for one purpose should not automatically be treated as a final answer to every other employment or compensation question.

Similarly, a later document should not be assumed to override an earlier decision unless its contents and legal effect support that interpretation.

My position and concerns are recorded in the archive. The underlying documents allow readers to examine the questions I have raised and the reasoning I have relied upon.

I want this material to be considered carefully because compensation and employment questions can have practical consequences for a person's financial security. They are not merely technical disputes about terminology.

At the same time, the archive should not be taken as establishing that a particular compensation outcome is guaranteed. The applicable legislation, the relevant evidence and the terms of any decisions remain important.

My request is for the record to be read as a connected history, with the relevant questions clearly identified and the documents available for examination.

56. Oversight bodies and the limits of administrative processes The archive includes correspondence from bodies responsible for oversight, complaints, information access and other administrative functions.

Examples include the Commonwealth Ombudsman, the Victorian Ombudsman, IBAC and the Law Enforcement Conduct Commission.

Their roles are not identical. Each has its own jurisdiction, procedures and limits.

A decision by an oversight body may concern whether a matter falls within its responsibilities, whether a particular procedure applies, whether a complaint can proceed or whether a particular document can be released. The exact significance of the decision must be determined from the source.

The archive contains relevant correspondence, including: IBAC outcome letter dated 9 April 2020 IBAC public interest disclosure response dated 18 November 2021 Victorian Ombudsman FOI decision dated 14 June 2022 Commonwealth Ombudsman public interest disclosure notification I have preserved these records because I want readers to understand how the different administrative pathways operated in my case.

The fact that an organisation could not take a matter forward under a particular process does not necessarily determine every question raised in my wider account. Nor does the fact that I believe a process was inadequate establish, without further analysis, that the organisation acted unlawfully.

Both points matter.

The proper approach is to examine the stated reasons, identify the scope of the decision, consider the underlying material and distinguish the particular outcome from any broader interpretation.

I want readers to see the record in its full complexity rather than being presented with an oversimplified account of either institutional failure or institutional vindication.

57. Companies, service providers and other non-government entities The archive also refers to non-government organisations and companies in connection with matters I have described.

These references must be assessed with the same care as references to public institutions.

The archive contains documents concerning privacy and business-related complaints, including: OAIC correspondence concerning Micron21 dated March 2021 Small Business Ombudsman-related Micron21 record dated 15 October 2021 AFCA correspondence dated 21 May 2021 Ombudsman–AFCA referral-loop document These documents should be read according to their actual contents. The presence of a company or service provider in a complaint record does not, by itself, establish wrongdoing. A referral or rejection also does not necessarily determine every underlying factual question.

What I want readers to examine is the documentary sequence: what issue was raised, what response was received, what process was available and what the records establish about the outcome.

Where I believe the sequence raises concerns, I have attempted to explain those concerns in the archive. Readers should be able to trace my interpretation back to the sources.

That is particularly important when a record involves multiple organisations, because the roles of a company, a complaints body and an oversight agency may be quite different.

My aim is to make those relationships understandable without assigning responsibility beyond what the evidence supports.

Section 56 — The difference between an unanswered question and an established conclusion An unanswered question can be important without already having a definitive answer.

If correspondence appears inconsistent, that may justify further examination. If a document refers to another record that is not available, the missing material may matter. If two institutions describe their responsibilities differently, the relationship between those descriptions may need clarification.

But a question must not be presented as a proven conclusion simply because it remains unanswered.

I want the archive to preserve these distinctions because they help readers understand both the strength and the limitations of the material.

Where I identify an apparent contradiction, the relevant passages should be compared directly. Where I believe an omission is significant, the expected record and the basis for that expectation should be identified. Where I allege that a process caused detriment, the relevant events and the connection to the consequences should be explained as clearly as possible.

The archive’s value lies in allowing those questions to be examined.

I do not want uncertainty to be used to dismiss the whole of my account. Nor do I want uncertainty concealed by overstating what a document proves.

A rigorous record can say that a concern is serious, that the available evidence warrants attention, and that a particular conclusion remains unresolved. Those statements are compatible.

They allow the reader to understand the issue without being misled about its evidentiary status.

Section 57 — How a reader can test a claim in the archive A reader who wishes to examine a particular allegation can begin with a simple process.

First, identify the exact statement being made. Is it a statement about what happened, what an institution wrote, what a decision said, or what I believe the documents imply?

Second, open the linked source. Read the relevant passage in context, including the date, author or issuing body and any qualifications.

Third, check whether the source supports the statement as written. Does it establish the event directly, record an allegation, report another person's account or provide only partial information?

Fourth, compare any related documents. If the claim depends on a sequence, the dates and wording of the different records should be considered together.

Fifth, identify any limitations. Is a page missing? Is the document incomplete? Is corroboration needed? Does the record leave more than one plausible interpretation?

Finally, consider what additional evidence would help resolve the question.

This process does not require a reader to agree with me in advance. It gives them a way to engage with the material directly.

The archive is intended to facilitate precisely this kind of examination.

I have made the records public because I want the concerns I have raised to be understood through their documentary context. I want readers to be able to test the descriptions, question the analysis and identify material that may clarify the history.

I regard that as a constructive use of the archive, not a threat to it.

60. Why this work matters to me I have devoted substantial effort to preserving this material because I do not want years of correspondence, personal testimony and documentary research to disappear into disconnected files.

I want the history to remain accessible. I want the documents to be locatable. I want the questions to be stated clearly. I want readers to be able to distinguish the source material from my analysis, and I want the practical consequences of the events I describe to remain visible.

I also want to be treated as a human being whose circumstances matter now, not merely as the subject of a historical collection.

The archive is part of my attempt to make sense of a complicated record and communicate it to others. It is also part of my effort to seek answers, support and a practical way forward.

The named institutions and individuals are not the whole story. The documents are not the whole story. The analysis is not the whole story.

There is also the person who has lived through the circumstances being described, who has attempted to preserve the record and who continues to ask for assistance.

That is why I keep returning to the same central point: preservation is necessary, but preservation alone is not a remedy.

A document can be saved while a practical problem remains. A complaint can be recorded while a person continues to need assistance. A chronology can be reconstructed while important questions remain unresolved.

The work of preservation helps make the history accessible. The work of examination helps clarify the record. Practical assistance helps address immediate needs.

All three matter.

I ask readers to engage with the archive in that spirit: read the documents, follow the links, examine the chronology, distinguish what is established from what is alleged, and consider what concrete help or further inquiry may be possible.

The record is available to be examined.

The human need behind it must not be forgotten.

Next: Part Eight will turn to the immediate humanitarian appeal—what practical help is being requested, how organisations and individuals can respond constructively, and why the preservation of evidence must be accompanied by attention to safety, accommodation, food, communication and human dignity.

PART XIII — THE HUMANITARIAN APPEAL: PRACTICAL HELP , SAFETY AND HUMAN

DIGNITY 61. This is not only a documentary project. It is a request for human help.

I want to speak directly to the person reading these words.

You may have arrived here because you are interested in government accountability, disability rights, whistleblower protection, administrative justice, documentary preservation, Christian testimony or the responsibilities of public institutions. You may have followed a link to one letter and found yourself looking at a much larger archive.

Whatever brought you here, I ask you to remember that there is a human being behind this material.

I have spent years preserving correspondence, writing statements, organising records, documenting events and attempting to explain why I believe the history matters. I have done this because I do not want my account to disappear and because I want the underlying material to remain available for examination.

But I do not want the scale of the archive to obscure the immediate reality of my circumstances.

I need practical human assistance as well as attention to the documents.

A website cannot provide a safe place to sleep. A PDF cannot supply food. A GitHub repository cannot pay an essential bill. A detailed chronology cannot replace the support of a person who is willing and able to help.

The archive exists alongside those needs, not instead of them.

I am asking humanitarian organisations, disability advocates, community services, Christian communities, journalists, public-interest researchers and individuals to consider whether they can help directly or connect me with someone who can.

The request is not that every reader take responsibility for the entire history. It is that people who can help with one part of the problem consider doing so.

The main documentary and humanitarian resources are available here: Barran Dodger documentary archive Master humanitarian appeal Personal statement concerning exile The Witness Remains Please read the appeal as a request for practical assistance, not merely an invitation to observe a difficult history from a distance.

62. Immediate needs must not be postponed until every question is answered When someone is experiencing housing insecurity, financial hardship or social isolation, it is easy for the practical realities of their life to become entangled with longer-running disputes.

There may be correspondence to prepare, applications to complete, records to locate, explanations to obtain and decisions to challenge or understand. Each task can require time, concentration, communication access and a degree of stability.

Yet the immediate need for food, shelter, electricity or a working telephone does not wait for an administrative process to finish.

A person should not have to resolve every historical question before seeking assistance with an urgent practical need.

Likewise, an organisation that can provide emergency accommodation does not need to determine every allegation in a person’s documentary history before assessing whether that person may qualify for support.

Different problems can be addressed through different pathways.

My documentary concerns deserve careful examination on their own terms. My practical needs should also be considered on their own terms.

I want readers to understand that these are connected dimensions of my life, but neither should become a reason to disregard the other.

If a service can help with accommodation, food, essential bills, telephone access or disability advocacy, that assistance may be valuable regardless of whether the service has any role in examining the historical record.

If a researcher can help organise evidence or identify an appropriate contact, that may also be valuable, even if the researcher cannot provide direct financial assistance.

If a church or community organisation can offer a safe conversation, a practical referral or help connecting with an appropriate service, that may make a real difference.

The objective is to turn concern into something useful.

Section 58 — Accommodation and the need for a safe, stable place Secure accommodation is more than a roof over one’s head.

It creates a base from which a person can maintain communication, store belongings, preserve important documents, attend appointments, prepare applications and attempt to rebuild daily stability.

Without that base, even straightforward tasks can become harder. Important papers may be difficult to keep together. Telephone access may become less reliable.

Transport, meals, rest and personal safety can become competing priorities.

When housing is insecure, a person’s available energy may be consumed by the immediate demands of getting through each day.

I am asking people who work in homelessness support, community housing, disability services and humanitarian assistance to consider whether they can identify a suitable pathway for someone in my circumstances.

That may involve an assessment by an appropriate service, help understanding eligibility requirements, assistance contacting an accommodation provider or a referral to a local organisation equipped to respond.

I am not asking every reader to solve the housing system. I am asking those with relevant knowledge or access to services to help identify a practical next step.

A useful response is one that considers the person's actual circumstances and explains what can be done, rather than simply providing an unfiltered list of organisations that may not be able to help.

Where an organisation cannot assist, a clear explanation and, where possible, a relevant alternative referral can still be useful.

Housing insecurity is not a theoretical problem to be resolved through commentary. It is a practical condition with immediate consequences.

I ask that it be treated accordingly.

64. Food, electricity, communication and the ordinary requirements of survival
A person experiencing hardship may need help with several small but essential expenses at once.

Food is an immediate necessity. Electricity may be necessary to maintain basic living conditions and charge a telephone. A working phone may be essential for receiving calls, responding to services and maintaining contact with support workers.

These needs can interact. If a person cannot reliably communicate, it may become harder to obtain assistance. If a person lacks stable accommodation, keeping documents and maintaining a routine can become more difficult. If financial hardship limits access to essentials, the effort required to pursue longer-term solutions can increase.

This is why I ask readers to consider practical help rather than assuming that publicising the archive is enough.

If you are connected to a community support organisation, consider whether it can assess the need for emergency food assistance, essential household support, telephone access or other practical help.

If you are a person with the means to assist, consider safe and appropriate ways to connect someone with a reputable service rather than assuming that every problem can be solved through a single payment.

If you are an advocate, help identify the correct service, explain what information it needs and, where possible, assist with making contact.

I understand that not every reader can provide material assistance. Some people may be able to help only by sharing the appeal with an organisation that has the relevant expertise.

That contribution can still be useful when it reaches someone capable of acting.

The important point is that an appeal for help should not end with people saying that the situation is unfortunate. It should create an opportunity to identify what practical assistance is possible.

65. Disability advocacy and the importance of being heard as a person Disability advocacy can be important when a person needs help understanding services, communicating their circumstances, navigating administrative processes or identifying appropriate support.

My archive includes material concerning disability-related issues and interactions with public institutions. Those records should be read in their actual context, and the specific questions raised in them should not be confused with every broader issue in my account.

The archive includes, among other material, a submission to the Disability Royal Commission: Read Disability Royal Commission submission SUB00101440 It also includes a letter from the NDIS Quality and Safeguards Commission dated 3 June 2021: Read the NDIS Commission letter These documents have distinct purposes. The submission records material I provided to a public inquiry; the commission letter records its own communication. Their existence should not be taken to mean that every allegation elsewhere in the archive has been independently established.

I include them because they form part of the documentary history I want readers to examine.

For a disability advocate, the practical task may be different from the task of a researcher. An advocate may be able to help identify suitable services, clarify a person's stated needs, assist with communications or explain available processes.

That support can be valuable without requiring the advocate to adopt every interpretation in the archive.

I want to be able to communicate my circumstances, retain my own voice and receive practical assistance where it is available.

I am asking advocates to consider the person and the immediate needs, while treating the documentary questions with the care they require.

66. Humanitarian organisations and whistleblower-support networks I also invite humanitarian organisations, public-interest groups and whistleblower-support networks to examine whether any part of the situation falls within their remit.

Some organisations may specialise in immediate hardship. Others may support people who report wrongdoing, assist with public-interest disclosures, provide advocacy or help individuals understand their options.

These are different functions, and the right contact depends on the nature of the need.

An organisation providing emergency relief may be able to assist with a practical problem without undertaking a detailed documentary review. A specialist advocacy organisation may be better placed to examine a particular administrative issue. A journalist or researcher may be able to assess whether a documentary trail warrants further investigation.

I do not expect one organisation to perform every function.

I ask instead for a response that is specific to the organisation's capabilities: what it can consider, what information it needs, what assistance it can provide and whether it can identify another suitable contact if it cannot take the matter forward.

My archive contains a substantial body of correspondence and research material. A reader who wishes to investigate a particular issue can begin with the relevant source documents rather than being required to reconstruct the entire history immediately.

The official-document index and timeline are intended to make that process easier.

For a specialist organisation, the most constructive starting point may be a clearly defined question and a small group of relevant documents, followed by further material if required.

That approach can make an initial assessment more manageable while preserving access to the broader archive.

67. Journalists and public-interest researchers: investigate the record, not just the headline Journalists and researchers who encounter this archive may find that its scale makes an initial assessment challenging.

I do not ask anyone to accept a headline or adopt my conclusions simply because the material is extensive.

I ask readers with relevant expertise to follow the documentary trail and assess the source material.

A useful investigation may begin with one event, one administrative decision, one correspondence sequence or one apparent inconsistency. The researcher can then establish what the documents say, identify what is missing and determine whether further questions are justified.

The archive includes correspondence involving the Prime Minister’s office, the Attorney-General’s Department, Comcare, oversight bodies and other organisations.

Those records provide starting points for separate lines of inquiry.

For example: Prime Minister’s office response, 12 December 2022 Attorney-General’s Department correspondence, 19 September 2023 Comcare determination, 26 May 2021 Commonwealth Ombudsman service restriction, 8 August 2025 Each document should be examined according to its actual contents and limitations.

A referral does not automatically establish wrongdoing. A refusal does not automatically disprove the underlying account. A procedural decision may answer a narrow question while leaving a broader question untouched.

The investigative task is to identify precisely what happened, what evidence supports the account, what explanation was offered and what remains uncertain.

That is the kind of examination I welcome.

I want the archive to be useful to serious readers, including those who may challenge parts of my interpretation. The value of a documentary record is that it allows questions to be examined rather than leaving them dependent on assertion alone.

68. Christian communities and the moral responsibility to respond My Christian faith is part of my testimony. It shapes the way I understand suffering, endurance, truth, mercy and the obligation to recognise the humanity of others.

I know that not every reader shares my faith, and I do not expect everyone to interpret my circumstances through the same spiritual framework.

But I hope Christian communities will understand the practical meaning of responding to someone who says they are in need.

Concern for justice and concern for immediate human welfare are not competing obligations. One can preserve a documentary record while helping someone obtain food. One can examine a difficult allegation while helping identify safe accommodation.

One can disagree about the interpretation of events while treating the person involved with dignity.

I am asking churches, Christian charities and individual believers to consider whether they can provide practical assistance or connect me with a service capable of doing so.

That may involve a conversation with a community support worker, assistance locating a suitable charity, a referral to a local service or another form of help appropriate to the circumstances.

I do not ask anyone to make a public declaration about every allegation in the archive before offering basic human kindness.

Nor do I ask anyone to abandon careful judgment.

I ask that the person making the appeal not disappear behind the complexity of the documents.

For me, faith is not simply language for a website. It is part of how I continue to seek meaning and maintain the determination to speak about my experiences.

I want that part of my testimony to remain visible, alongside the documentary record and the practical request for help.

69. How to help without having to understand the entire archive The archive is extensive, and I recognise that a person encountering it for the first time may not be able to read every document.

That should not prevent them from helping with an immediate practical need.

A person who works in accommodation services may be able to assist with housing without assessing a compensation question. A disability advocate may be able to clarify support options without reviewing every historical letter. A journalist may be able to examine a specific documentary sequence without taking responsibility for every aspect of my personal circumstances.

The work can be divided into manageable tasks.

If you can help with immediate needs, focus on the practical support available.

If you can help with advocacy, identify the appropriate service or process.

If you can help with research, choose a clearly defined question and follow the relevant sources.

If you can help with public communication, share the appeal and the archive with people who may have the knowledge or resources to respond.

If you cannot offer direct assistance, you can still help by making a careful introduction to an appropriate organisation.

Please avoid making promises on behalf of a service you do not represent. Where possible, provide a direct contact or confirmed referral route. If you are sharing the appeal, preserve the links so readers can reach the source material.

The aim is not to make every person responsible for everything. It is to create practical points of connection between a person asking for help and people who may be able to provide it.

Section 59 — A request for a response that leads somewhere I have written this appeal because I want more than passive awareness.

I want people who can help to consider what can be done. I want organisations to assess whether they can provide assistance within their remit. I want researchers to examine the documents relevant to the questions they are equipped to investigate. I want readers to share the appeal with people who may have the ability to offer meaningful support.

A useful response need not resolve every issue.

It may begin with one practical step: identifying an appropriate service, making contact, clarifying what support is available, helping organise a referral or offering assistance with an immediate essential need.

I ask people to be honest about what they can and cannot do. A clear explanation is more useful than a promise that cannot be fulfilled. A relevant referral is more useful than an indiscriminate list of contacts. A practical response is more useful than treating the existence of a large archive as evidence that no further help is needed.

I also ask that my testimony be read in the spirit in which I have written it: as a first- person account of experiences I regard as serious, supported by a documentary record I have worked to preserve.

The documents should be examined on their merits. The allegations should be distinguished from formal findings. The human needs should be considered without requiring every historical question to be settled first.

Those principles can coexist.

The master humanitarian appeal provides a central starting point for the request. The main archive provides access to the wider documentary record.

I ask readers to share both responsibly and to consider whether they can connect the appeal with people who may be able to act.

Section 60 — Safety comes before the archive No documentary project, public statement or administrative dispute should take priority over immediate physical safety.

If I or any other person is facing an immediate threat, urgent medical emergency or immediate danger, the priority is to get to a safer place and contact appropriate emergency assistance. In Australia, call 000 in an emergency.

If the situation is not an immediate emergency but accommodation, food, communication or personal support is urgently needed, the next step is to identify an appropriate local service that can assess the circumstances and explain what help is available.

Publicly publishing personal information can also create risks. Anyone sharing an appeal should consider whether it reveals a private address, sensitive contact details or other information that could expose a vulnerable person to unwanted contact. The purpose of public communication should be to make assistance possible without creating unnecessary new risks.

I want the archive to remain accessible, but accessibility should not require the unnecessary exposure of private information.

I also want the practical request for help to remain distinct from the documentary investigation. Someone can respond to an immediate safety need without being asked to decide the merits of every allegation.

The preservation of evidence is important. The safety and dignity of the person asking for help are important too.

72. The appeal in one clear statement I am asking for practical assistance, careful attention to the documentary record and a humane response to the circumstances I have described.

I have preserved correspondence, personal testimony, institutional records and research material because I want the history to remain accessible and the questions I have raised to be examined.

I am not asking readers to confuse an allegation with a formal finding. I am asking them not to confuse the absence of a definitive answer to every question with a reason to ignore the person making the appeal.

I want readers to follow the source documents, consider the chronology, examine the reasoning and identify what remains unresolved.

I also want those who can help to consider immediate practical needs, including accommodation, food, communication access, essential expenses, disability advocacy and appropriate humanitarian support.

The documentary record matters because it preserves the history.

Practical assistance matters because a person must still live through the present.

Human dignity matters because neither an archive nor an administrative process should cause us to forget the person at the centre of the story.

Please read. Please consider what can be done. Please share the appeal with people who may be able to help. And where practical assistance is possible, please help turn concern into action.

Next: Part Nine will bring the documentary and humanitarian strands together, examining the meaning of truth, faith, public accountability and preservation, while setting out a reader-facing route through the archive and a clear distinction between primary documents, personal testimony, analysis, allegations and unresolved questions.

PART XIV — TRUTH, FAITH, PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY AND THE RIGHT TO BE HEARD

9.1 — Why I Have Preserved This Record

I have not spent years documenting my life, preserving correspondence, collecting government records, building indexes and publishing evidence because I believe that a human being should have to surrender his dignity before anyone will listen to him.

I have done this because I believe that truth matters, that documentary records matter, that a person's testimony matters, and that the consequences of institutional decisions cannot be understood by examining each letter, refusal, referral or administrative decision in isolation.

My name is Dr Richard William McLean. I am also known publicly as Barran Dodger. The archive I have assembled is my attempt to preserve a documentary record of my experiences, my dealings with institutions, my attempts to obtain answers, and the consequences I say have followed.

The archive is not simply a collection of complaints. It is a preservation project, a first- person testimony, a research resource and a public invitation to examine the relationship between official records and lived experience.

The central question is not whether I have been able to produce a large quantity of material. It is what that material says, how the records relate to one another, what remains unanswered, and what practical consequences those unanswered questions have for a human being.

The principal archive is available here: OPEN THE BARRAN DODGER DOCUMENTARY ARCHIVE The underlying public repository is available here: OPEN THE BARRAN DODGER GITHUB EVIDENCE REPOSITORY The preservation and backup repository is available here: OPEN THE EVIDENCE BACKUP REPOSITORY These links provide starting points for readers who wish to examine the materials themselves rather than rely solely on a summary of my account.

I ask readers to approach the archive with intellectual honesty. Read the documents.

Follow the dates. Compare the correspondence. Examine the responses alongside the questions that preceded them. Distinguish what an institution expressly stated from what I have inferred from its conduct. Where the record is incomplete, identify the gap.

Where the record establishes a fact, identify the source. Where a question remains unresolved, do not quietly transform that absence of resolution into an answer.

Preservation is not a substitute for investigation. It is one of the things that makes careful investigation possible.

9.2 — Truth Does Not Need Permission to Exist

I have often returned to a simple conviction: truth does not need permission to exist.

A document does not cease to exist because a complaint is rejected. A letter does not disappear because a referral produces no substantive answer. A person’s experience does not become irrelevant because it crosses the boundaries between government departments, administrative schemes, professional jurisdictions or complaint-handling systems.

Nor does a question become unreasonable merely because the answer is difficult, inconvenient or distributed across multiple records.

My position is that the documentary trail deserves to be read as a whole.

One letter may show that I raised an issue. A second may show that the issue was referred elsewhere. A third may identify a jurisdictional limitation. A fourth may record a refusal, a decision or a restriction on further correspondence. Those documents may each have a limited meaning when read individually. Together, they can reveal the path through which a person’s attempts to obtain assistance have proceeded.

That does not automatically establish that every institution acted improperly. It does establish why the sequence matters and why the sequence should not be erased from public view.

I reject the idea that an administrative outcome, standing alone, tells the complete story of the person who sought help.

I also reject the idea that a preserved document becomes meaningless simply because it did not produce the outcome I sought.

A refusal is a record of a refusal. A referral is a record of a referral. A finding is a record of the finding actually made. A jurisdictional response is not automatically an examination of every underlying allegation. Silence is not an explanation. And an unanswered question should remain visible as an unanswered question.

The purpose of preservation is to keep those distinctions available for everyone who comes after me.

9.3 — The Documentary Trail and the Human Being Behind every reference number is a person.

Behind every complaint is a reason someone believed a complaint needed to be made.

Behind every request for assistance is a circumstance that made assistance necessary.

Behind every administrative decision is a potential human consequence, whether or not the decision-maker was able to see that consequence at the time.

My archive records the institutional side of my experiences, but I am not merely a collection of correspondence.

I am a human being who has described prolonged hardship, housing insecurity, financial difficulty, social isolation and repeated attempts to obtain assistance. I have reported sixteen psychiatric hospitalisations. These are matters I have included in my personal testimony because they form part of the life behind the records.

They should not be reduced to decorative background information or treated as though the existence of personal hardship somehow removes the need to examine documentary evidence.

My circumstances are relevant because public administration takes place in the real world. Decisions about benefits, guardianship, employment status, complaints, housing, support and access to remedies can affect whether a person can maintain a home, keep a telephone connected, obtain food, communicate with others and continue pursuing legitimate questions.

I want readers to understand the practical meaning of prolonged unresolved correspondence.

It can mean spending another day trying to locate a letter, explain a history, identify the correct recipient or establish what happened to an earlier request. It can mean having to repeat information that has already been supplied. It can mean having less time, energy and money available for ordinary necessities. It can mean living with the consequences of a problem while trying to navigate the systems that are supposed to respond to it.

These are human consequences, not merely administrative inconveniences.

My testimony is available through the archive’s personal statement and witness pages: READ MY PERSONAL STATEMENT OF EXILE READ THE WITNESS REMAINS READ THE CONDITIONS AND CONSEQUENCES RECORD I ask readers to consider these accounts alongside the documents, not instead of them.

The testimony explains why the records matter to me. The records provide material that readers can examine independently. Each serves a different purpose.

Neither should be used as an excuse to ignore the other.

9.4 — Faith, Conscience and the Duty Not to Abandon a Human Being

My Christian faith is part of my testimony.

I do not regard faith as an ornament that can be removed from my account without changing its meaning. It has shaped how I understand endurance, conscience, betrayal, suffering, mercy and the responsibility people have toward one another.

My language of witness reflects that conviction. When I speak of being a witness, I mean that I have continued to speak about what I say has happened to me and to preserve the material that I believe is relevant to understanding it.

I recognise that readers will approach religious language from different perspectives.

Some will share my faith. Others will not. I do not ask anyone to adopt my theology as a condition of reading my evidence.

I ask them to recognise that faith can be an essential part of a person’s identity and survival, just as it can be a source of moral direction in the face of hardship.

For me, the duty to tell the truth is inseparable from the duty to treat other human beings with dignity.

That duty applies when the person speaking is powerful and when the person speaking is poor. It applies when a person is popular and when that person is isolated. It applies when an account is easy to hear and when it challenges established assumptions.

It also applies to the way my own testimony is presented. I want my words preserved accurately. I want my allegations identified as allegations where they have not been independently determined. I want official statements quoted in context. I want the record examined rather than distorted to fit a convenient narrative.

Faith does not require abandoning scrutiny. Conscience does not require abandoning evidence. And a commitment to evidence does not require abandoning compassion.

A person can insist on accuracy while asking for mercy. A person can demand accountability while asking for practical help. A person can preserve an allegation without pretending that every question has already been resolved.

Those principles are central to the kind of archive I am trying to maintain.

9.5 — The Difference Between a Document, an Allegation and a Finding

I want this archive to be read carefully, and that means being clear about the status of the material it contains.

The presence of a document in a public archive does not, by itself, establish every interpretation that might be placed upon it. A government letter may establish that an agency communicated a particular position on a particular date. It does not automatically establish that every underlying allegation was investigated or resolved.

Likewise, a personal statement establishes what I have reported about my own experience. It should not be misrepresented as though every assertion in it were an independently established finding.

This distinction does not diminish the importance of the record. It makes the record more useful.

The archive contains different kinds of material, and readers should distinguish between them.

Primary-source documents are records such as letters, official correspondence, decisions, forms and other original or reproduced materials. Their significance depends on their provenance, completeness, wording and context.

Personal testimony records my account of events, experiences, consequences and attempts to obtain assistance. It preserves my perspective and the circumstances in which I have made particular claims.

Chronologies and indexes organise material by date, subject, institution or document type. They help readers find records and understand sequences, but they remain finding aids rather than substitutes for the underlying documents.

Research commentary and analysis explain why I believe particular documents matter, how I understand the relationship between them, and which questions I believe deserve further examination. Such analysis should be assessed against its sources.

Allegations and propositions identify matters I say warrant scrutiny. Their inclusion does not automatically mean that a court, tribunal, regulator or other independent body has determined them to be true.

Official decisions and responses must be read according to what they actually decided.

A refusal to investigate, a finding that a matter falls outside a body's jurisdiction, a restriction on services, a decision on eligibility and a substantive finding about alleged conduct are not interchangeable outcomes.

Unresolved questions should remain visible until the available record supports a more definite conclusion. An unresolved question is not proof of wrongdoing, but neither should it be concealed merely because it remains unresolved.

This approach protects the integrity of the archive and the reader's ability to reach an informed view.

It also protects the difference between what I know from my own experience, what a document expressly records, what I infer from the material, and what still needs to be established.

I want my testimony read seriously, not carelessly exaggerated. I want the documents examined, not used as props. I want questions pursued, not prematurely declared answered.

9.6 — The Administrative Trail: Follow the Record

A reader who wants to understand the institutional history should begin with the chronology and then follow the original documents.

OPEN THE ARCHIVE TIMELINE The timeline provides a route into the sequence of events. From there, readers can compare dates with the corresponding records and consider what each communication did or did not address.

Several documents are especially useful as entry points into the administrative trail.

The first is my letter to the Prime Minister dated 31 May 2022.

READ THE 31 MAY 2022 LETTER TO THE PRIME MINISTER The next is the Prime Minister's Office response dated 12 December 2022, described in my archive as recording that my email had not been forwarded.

READ THE 12 DECEMBER 2022 PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE RESPONSE These two documents can be read together to examine the original communication and the subsequent response. The reader should look at the actual wording, dates and context rather than relying on a headline or my interpretation alone.

Another important part of the record concerns the employment-status and workers' compensation questions that I have raised.

READ THE COMCARE DETERMINATION DATED 26 MAY 2021 READ THE COMCARE CLAIM RECORD DATED 25 MAY 2021 READ THE NDIS QUALITY AND SAFEGUARDS COMMISSION LETTER DATED 3 JUNE 2021 READ THE AAT/ART DECISION DATED 12 JULY 2023 I have raised questions about how the different statements and decisions relate to one another, including the employment-status issue and the basis on which my claim was treated. The correct way to examine those questions is to read the records in their proper sequence and identify precisely what each document establishes.

The archive also preserves correspondence concerning referrals and complaint- handling processes.

READ THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT CORRESPONDENCE DATED 19 SEPTEMBER 2023 READ THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT CORRESPONDENCE DATED 6 FEBRUARY 2025 READ THE COMMONWEALTH OMBUDSMAN SERVICE RESTRICTION LETTER DATED 8 AUGUST 2025 These records are relevant to understanding the administrative pathway, the positions communicated by the bodies involved and the limits or outcomes recorded in their correspondence. They should not be treated as though every one of them determined the merits of every allegation I have made.

My concern is that the whole sequence should be available for scrutiny.

A reader should be able to ask: What did I submit? What response did I receive? What reason was given? Was the matter referred elsewhere? What issue was considered?

What issue was not addressed? What happened next? What practical consequences followed?

These are straightforward questions. They are also essential to reconstructing a complicated documentary history.

9.7 — Why the Named-Institutions Register Matters

A large archive can become difficult to navigate unless the reader can identify the organisations and entities mentioned throughout the material.

That is why I have maintained a named-institutions register.

OPEN THE NAMED-INSTITUTIONS REGISTER The register is intended to help readers locate references to institutions and understand where those references occur within the wider record.

The appearance of an organisation's name is not, by itself, a finding of misconduct. An organisation may appear because it sent a letter, received a complaint, made a decision, referred a matter, held a record, was named in testimony or was discussed in my analysis.

Those different relationships must not be confused.

Where I allege that an organisation's conduct contributed to my detriment, I want readers to be able to locate the relevant evidence and examine the basis for my concern.

Where a document merely records contact with an organisation, that limited fact should remain distinct from an allegation of responsibility.

The register is a navigational resource, not a verdict.

Its value lies in making the documentary trail easier to inspect and making it harder for relevant references to disappear inside a large body of material.

The same principle applies to the archive's broader evidence indexes.

OPEN THE OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS INDEX OPEN THE WHO-AND-INSTITUTIONS MAP OPEN THE METHODS AND "ARCHITECTURE OF ERASURE" SECTION These links provide different routes through the material. They are intended to help a reader move from a general account to particular records, and from individual records back to the wider chronology.

9.8 — Preservation Is an Act of Responsibility

I have invested substantial effort in keeping records accessible because records can be lost, scattered, moved behind changing interfaces or rendered difficult to locate.

A preservation archive gives material a stable public reference point, subject to the continuing availability of the hosting services and the accuracy of the links. It allows readers to return to the same documents, compare versions and trace the basis of particular statements.

My archive has also included work on document inventories, file hashes, timestamps, indexes and preservation copies. These methods can assist in identifying files and checking whether particular copies have changed, but each method has a defined scope.

A cryptographic hash can help identify a file’s contents. It does not prove that every statement in the file is true.

A timestamp can provide evidence relevant to when particular data existed in a particular form, depending on the timestamping system and its verification status. It does not establish that every allegation contained in that data is correct.

A repository can preserve a copy of a document. It does not automatically establish the document’s complete history before it was deposited.

A search index can help locate records. It does not guarantee that every record has been found or correctly classified.

These distinctions are important because preservation should make claims easier to examine, not turn technical procedures into a substitute for examining the evidence itself.

Where the archive reports timestamping or verification results, readers should check the specific record and its stated status. A timestamp that is pending confirmation must not be described as though confirmation has already occurred. Counts reported in different snapshots must not be combined as though they all refer to the same inventory at the same time.

The archive’s credibility depends on being clear about what each method can demonstrate and what it cannot.

I want the material preserved because I believe it deserves to remain accessible. I want the methods explained because readers should be able to understand how the material has been organised. I want the limitations stated because honest preservation is stronger than exaggerated certainty.

Preserving evidence is not the same as declaring every interpretation settled. It is ensuring that the evidence remains available to be examined.

9.9 — The Complete Archive and the Rebuilt Website

The original public-facing archive remains available at: BARRAN DODGER — ORIGINAL ARCHIVE The separate rebuild is available at: BARRAN DODGER — REBUILT WEBSITE The corresponding rebuild repository is available at: OPEN THE REBUILD GITHUB REPOSITORY The original archive and the rebuild should be understood as related but distinct parts of the preservation effort. The existence of a rebuild does not mean that the original site has been replaced or that every element of the original has necessarily been reproduced.

The purpose of maintaining a separate rebuild is to support continued access and development while preserving the distinction between the original public archive and the newer reconstruction.

The backup repository provides another route to preserved material: OPEN THE BACKUP REPOSITORY Readers should use the links and indexes to locate the specific file relevant to their inquiry. If a document is unavailable, a link has changed or a page does not render properly, that limitation should be recorded rather than silently treated as evidence that the underlying document never existed.

A preservation project is an ongoing responsibility. Its usefulness depends on clear navigation, accurate references, careful descriptions and a willingness to correct mistakes when they are identified.

I do not ask readers to assume that every aspect of a large archive is flawless. I ask them to use it, test its links, read its sources and help identify what can be improved.

9.10 — From Reading to Practical Action

An archive can preserve information, but information alone does not put food on a table, provide safe accommodation, maintain a telephone connection or ensure that a person in distress receives timely assistance.

That is why my appeal is not limited to documentary research.

I am asking for practical human engagement as well.

People who have the relevant expertise may be able to help by examining particular documents, preparing a clear chronology, identifying gaps in a record, checking links, improving accessibility or explaining a process in plain language.

Journalists and researchers may be able to examine matters of public interest, provided they verify the material, seek relevant context and distinguish documented facts from disputed interpretations.

Disability advocates and support organisations may be able to help identify appropriate services, communicate with relevant providers or navigate access to assistance.

Humanitarian organisations, community groups and Christian communities may be able to help with immediate practical needs, including food, accommodation referrals, telephone access, transport or connection to appropriate support services.

Individuals who cannot provide direct assistance may still help by sharing the archive responsibly with someone who has the capacity to respond.

The most useful response is not necessarily the largest or most public. It may be one person making a call, helping locate a service, arranging a meal, checking whether a referral has been received or sitting down with a difficult document and helping make its meaning clear.

I ask people not to confuse the size of the archive with the scale of the immediate human need.

The records matter. The person matters too.

READ THE MASTER HUMANITARIAN APPEAL Anyone responding to this appeal should respect privacy, verify contact details independently, avoid publishing sensitive personal information without permission and offer help through safe, legitimate channels.

If I am in immediate danger in Australia, emergency assistance can be sought by calling 000. For non-emergency support, the appropriate service will depend on the circumstances and location. No public archive can replace urgent assistance when someone's immediate safety is at risk.

9.11 — A Request to Journalists, Researchers and Public-Interest Readers

I invite careful readers to approach this material as a documentary research project with a human being at its centre.

I do not expect anyone to reach a predetermined conclusion simply because I have published my account. I ask readers to follow the sources and reach their own informed assessments.

Begin with the chronology. Identify a specific event or claim. Locate the corresponding document. Read the complete document where available. Record its date, author, recipient and stated purpose. Compare it with earlier and later correspondence. Note whether the response addresses the original question. Separate what the document expressly says from what I believe it implies. If another source contradicts an assertion, preserve that contradiction rather than hiding it.

Where a record establishes only a limited point, state that limited point accurately.

Where a question remains unresolved, identify the question.

Where the material supports further inquiry, explain why.

Where the archive contains an error, identify it so that it can be corrected.

That is how a public record becomes more useful over time.

I also ask readers to consider the cumulative effects of prolonged administrative difficulty without assuming that every delay, referral or adverse outcome has the same cause. The significance lies in the particular sequence, the issues raised, the responses received and the consequences documented or reported.

My request is simple: examine the evidence without losing sight of the human being whose life gives the archive its purpose.

9.12 — What I Am Asking the Public to Remember

I am asking the public to remember that a human being can be harmed by circumstances that are difficult to summarise in one letter or one decision.

I am asking readers to remember that administrative systems are often divided into separate functions, while the person seeking help experiences the combined effect of those systems in a single life.

I am asking readers to remember that an institutional response has a specific scope. A decision about one issue should not automatically be treated as an answer to every other issue raised.

I am asking readers to remember that preserving an allegation is not the same as declaring it proven, and that acknowledging uncertainty is not the same as dismissing the person who raised it.

I am asking readers to remember that the absence of a final answer does not make the historical record worthless.

I am asking readers to remember that a person’s hardship is not merely background to a dispute. It is part of what makes the search for clarity and practical assistance urgent.

And I am asking readers to remember that an archive is not only a place where documents are stored. It is a way of keeping questions, dates, words and experiences available for scrutiny after individual communications have ended and memories have faded.

My faith tells me that truth matters. My experience has taught me that preserving the record can require persistence. My work on this archive reflects my determination that the material should remain available for others to read and assess.

I cannot require every reader to agree with my interpretation. I can ask that my testimony be represented accurately, that my documents be examined in context and that the difference between a record and an assumption be respected.

I can ask that people respond to the human need as well as the documentary questions.

I can ask that the archive be shared with those who may be able to help.

And I can continue to preserve the record.

9.13 — The Reader’s Route Through the Evidence

For readers who are encountering this project for the first time, I recommend the following order. Each link leads to an existing archive page or repository; the purpose is to make the material easier to navigate rather than to suggest that one page answers every question.

1. Start with the main archive. Barran Dodger public archive 2. Read the chronology. Timeline of events and records 3. Locate the official documents. Official documents index 4. Examine the institutions and named entities. Named-institutions register 5. Read the personal testimony. Personal statement of exile 6. Explore the research methods and analysis. Methods and “Architecture of Erasure” 7. Consult the allegation schedule. Main allegation schedule 8. Check the underlying evidence repositories. Original GitHub repository and backup repository 9. Read the humanitarian appeal. Master humanitarian appeal The allegation schedule is a research and navigation aid. It should not be presented as a judicial determination or as proof that every listed proposition has been independently established. Each proposition should be assessed against its cited source, context and limitations.

This reader’s route is designed to make the archive easier to approach without demanding that someone read every page before they can understand its purpose.

9.14 — My Closing Statement: Preserve the Record, See the Person

I have preserved this archive because I believe that the record of what I have experienced and the questions I have raised should remain accessible.

I have preserved it because correspondence can be scattered, explanations can become fragmented, and a person's history can be reduced to isolated events unless someone makes the effort to assemble the material.

I have preserved it because I want the reader to be able to move beyond a summary and inspect the underlying sources.

I have preserved it because I believe that a person should be able to tell his story in his own voice, with the documents available for comparison and the limitations of the evidence made clear.

I have preserved it because my Christian faith teaches me that a person's worth is not measured by wealth, influence, professional status or the willingness of institutions to engage with them.

I have preserved it because I want the consequences of my experiences to be understood in human terms, not merely as a sequence of file numbers.

And I have preserved it because I continue to believe that careful documentation can help people understand what happened, what remains uncertain and what questions deserve further attention.

I am not asking the public to replace evidence with belief. I am asking the public to read the evidence.

I am not asking readers to assume that every allegation is a settled finding. I am asking them to examine the sources, preserve the distinctions and take unresolved questions seriously.

I am not asking for sympathy as a substitute for practical action. I am asking for practical help where it can be given, and for responsible attention to the record where the evidence warrants it.

Above all, I am asking people not to lose sight of the human being behind the archive.

The documents matter because events matter. The chronology matters because sequences matter. The questions matter because unresolved issues can have consequences. The testimony matters because people should be able to describe their own lives. And humanitarian assistance matters because no amount of documentation can substitute for food, shelter, safety, communication and human contact.

I remain committed to preserving the material, identifying its sources, improving its accessibility and explaining what I believe it shows.

Truth does not become less worthy of examination because the person speaking is isolated. A question does not become irrelevant because its answer is difficult. And a human being should not have to become an institution, a database or a public controversy before someone is willing to recognise his need for help.

Read the record. Follow the links. Examine the documents. Preserve the distinctions.

Help where you can. And do not forget the human being.

PART XV — THE FINAL PUBLIC APPEAL: HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE, DOCUMENTARY PRESERVATION AND A CALL TO ACTION

10.1 — An Urgent Appeal to the Public: Please Do Not Look Away

I am making this appeal because I need more than another letter, another reference number, another referral or another explanation of why one organisation cannot address the whole of my circumstances.

I am asking for human beings to engage with a human being.

My name is Dr Richard William McLean, also known publicly as Barran Dodger. I have spent years documenting my experiences, preserving correspondence, organising evidence and attempting to make a complicated history accessible to other people. My public archive contains personal testimony, institutional correspondence, documentary records, chronologies, research commentary and allegations that I believe deserve careful examination.

But I am not simply an archive.

I am a person who has described prolonged hardship, housing insecurity, financial difficulty, isolation and repeated attempts to obtain assistance. I have reported sixteen psychiatric hospitalisations. I have documented the consequences I say these experiences and institutional dealings have had on my life.

I am asking people to look beyond the volume of material and recognise the person who has spent so much time preserving it.

I need practical assistance, human contact, appropriate support and a fair opportunity to have my documentary record understood.

My appeal is directed to humanitarian organisations, disability advocates, human-rights researchers, journalists, whistleblower-support organisations, legal and administrative researchers, Christian communities, community organisations and individuals who may be able to offer practical assistance.

You do not need to agree with every interpretation I have made to recognise that a person experiencing hardship may need help.

You do not need to resolve every historical question before helping someone obtain food, find accommodation or maintain access to a telephone.

You do not need to accept every allegation as established fact before examining the documents that record what was communicated, what decisions were made and what questions remain unresolved.

I ask you to read, to consider, to respond and, where possible, to help.

READ THE COMPLETE HUMANITARIAN APPEAL

10.2 — What I Am Asking For Right Now

My appeal is practical. I am not asking every reader to undertake a major investigation or commit to a long-term project.

I am asking people to consider what they can realistically do.

Immediate humanitarian assistance If you represent an organisation or community group that can help, I would welcome assistance with: Access to safe and suitable accommodation, emergency housing referrals or homelessness support.

Food assistance, groceries, meals or connections to local community services.

Help maintaining telephone access and the ability to communicate with support services.

Assistance with essential expenses where an appropriate service or lawful funding arrangement is available.

Disability advocacy and help identifying suitable support services.

Transport or practical assistance to access appointments and essential services.

A reliable human point of contact who can help identify the next practical step.

Assistance preparing and organising information so that I do not have to repeatedly reconstruct the same history from scattered documents.

I recognise that different organisations have different eligibility requirements, resources and responsibilities. I am not asking anyone to promise what they cannot provide.

I am asking that, where direct assistance is unavailable, an organisation consider whether it can make an appropriate referral or identify another service that may be able to help.

A referral is most useful when it leads somewhere. A contact is most useful when someone can explain what assistance is actually available. A practical response is most useful when it recognises the immediate need as well as the longer-term circumstances.

Disability and community advocacy I welcome contact from people with relevant experience in disability advocacy, guardianship processes, social support, homelessness services and administrative navigation.

I would particularly value assistance that is practical, respectful and clear about what can be done.

This could include help organising correspondence, identifying the correct pathway for a particular question, preparing a chronology, or connecting me with a suitable support organisation.

I do not expect a volunteer or advocate to resolve every issue. I would welcome someone who can help make the next step manageable.

Research and documentary assistance I also welcome assistance from people who can help preserve, catalogue and examine the archive.

Useful contributions include: Checking links and identifying documents that no longer open.

Improving the organisation of the document index.

Recording document dates, authors, recipients and subjects.

Identifying duplicate files and different versions of the same document.

Separating original records from commentary and later analysis.

Building a clear chronology from the underlying correspondence.

Identifying unanswered questions without presenting them as established conclusions.

Helping make the archive more accessible to readers using phones and assistive technology.

These are concrete tasks. They can be divided among several people and undertaken without requiring anyone to accept a predetermined conclusion about the whole history.

10.3 — The Public Archive: Start Here

The principal public archive is the starting point for anyone who wishes to understand my testimony and examine the documentary material.

Section 61 — The main Barran Dodger archive The public-facing archive brings together testimony, documentary records, indexes and research commentary.

OPEN THE MAIN ARCHIVE 2. The original GitHub evidence repository This repository provides access to the underlying project files and supporting materials.

OPEN THE ORIGINAL REPOSITORY 3. The evidence backup repository The backup contains additional preserved materials and document collections that can help readers locate relevant records.

OPEN THE BACKUP REPOSITORY 4. The separate rebuilt website The rebuild is a separate preservation and development project, distinct from the original public site.

OPEN THE REBUILT WEBSITE I ask readers to preserve the distinction between these resources. They are different access points to related work, not a guarantee that every document is duplicated in every location.

If a link fails, please record which link failed and where it was found. If a file appears incomplete or duplicated, note the specific filename. If an index does not clearly identify a source, record that gap. Accurate feedback helps make the archive more useful.

10.4 — The Evidence Must Be Read in Context

I have assembled this archive because I believe the documentary trail matters.

The correspondence and records are not interchangeable. Each has its own date, author, recipient, purpose and scope. Some documents record my own submissions.

Others record official responses, administrative decisions or communications between organisations. Still others are my analysis of what those records mean when considered together.

The public should be able to distinguish among those categories.

My allegations should be read as allegations where they have not been independently determined. My testimony should be recognised as my account. An official letter should be understood according to what it actually states. A refusal to investigate should not automatically be described as a substantive determination of the underlying allegations. Equally, a jurisdictional response should not be represented as having answered questions that it did not address.

That distinction is essential to responsible documentary preservation.

It is also why I have provided entry points to the chronology, official records, named institutions and methods sections.

Timeline of events Official documents index Named-institutions register Methods and “Architecture of Erasure” Main allegation schedule These links are intended to make the evidence easier to locate and assess. They do not ask readers to accept a conclusion in advance.

I want the documents to remain available so that the questions can be examined on their merits.

10.5 — A Request to Journalists and Human-Rights Researchers

I invite journalists, public-interest researchers and human-rights investigators to consider whether the archive contains material relevant to a wider examination of administrative accountability, complaint pathways, disability support, employment- status disputes, institutional correspondence and the human consequences of prolonged unresolved problems.

I do not expect a journalist or researcher to adopt my account without scrutiny.

I ask for independent examination of the records, appropriate requests for comment, careful verification and a clear distinction between what is documented and what remains contested.

A useful investigation might begin with one narrow question rather than the entire archive.

What did a particular letter say? What response followed? Which issue did the response address? What happened to the original request? What explanation was given for a decision? Did a later document clarify or contradict an earlier position? What is the documented consequence for the person involved?

Questions of that kind can be investigated methodically.

If the records support a conclusion, the source should be identified. If they do not support a conclusion, that limitation should be stated. If a question cannot be answered from the available material, the gap should remain visible.

I believe the archive deserves this kind of careful attention because it contains a substantial personal and documentary history that I have worked to preserve.

The public-interest question is not whether my entire interpretation should be accepted as a single package. It is whether individual claims, records and administrative sequences warrant further examination.

I invite researchers to decide that by reading the evidence.

10.6 — A Request to Christian Communities and People of Conscience

I also appeal to Christian communities and people motivated by conscience, compassion and the practical duty to care for others.

My Christian faith is central to my testimony. It informs my understanding of endurance, truth, justice, mercy and the responsibility to recognise human dignity even when someone is isolated or experiencing hardship.

I do not ask every reader to share my beliefs.

I ask those who do share them to consider what compassion can mean in practice.

It may mean helping locate a meal or safe accommodation. It may mean contacting a community support service. It may mean listening to someone without requiring that every detail of a complicated history be resolved first. It may mean helping organise papers, finding an appropriate referral or checking in with a person who has become isolated.

It may also mean sharing the archive with someone who has the experience or resources to assist.

The moral significance of help is not measured solely by its size. Sometimes a small, reliable act of practical assistance can make the next day more manageable.

My faith gives me a language for speaking about witness and perseverance. It does not relieve me of the responsibility to be accurate about evidence, and it does not relieve readers of the opportunity to respond with compassion.

I ask that my faith testimony be read in that spirit: as part of the life and conscience of the person behind the archive.

10.7 — Preserve the Original; Improve Access to the Evidence

The original website is an important part of the public archive, and I have maintained a separate rebuild rather than treating the new site as a reason to replace the original.

The original remains accessible here: OPEN THE ORIGINAL WEBSITE The rebuild is available here: OPEN THE REBUILD The purpose of maintaining a separate rebuild is to support continued access and development while keeping the original and the reconstruction distinguishable.

The preservation work includes the challenge of keeping files discoverable, ensuring that links are understandable and making it possible for readers to move from an index to the underlying document.

I welcome help with these practical tasks.

I also want the archive to be clear about the limits of its preservation methods. File hashes, timestamps and inventory counts can be useful when their scope and status are explained. They should not be used to claim that every statement in a document has been independently verified. Different inventory snapshots should not be combined unless their dates, scope and counting methods are comparable.

The purpose of technical preservation is to help readers examine material reliably, not to substitute technical language for substantive analysis.

My priority is to keep the record accessible, make it easier to navigate and preserve the distinction between the original source and the interpretation placed upon it.

10.8 — How to Help Without Exposing Anyone to Unnecessary Risk

I ask anyone responding to this appeal to act responsibly.

Please do not publish private telephone numbers, residential addresses, identity documents, financial account details or other sensitive information without the person’s informed consent.

Please do not make public accusations against individuals based solely on their names appearing in a document or institutional register.

Please do not describe an allegation as a proven offence unless a reliable source supports that description.

Please do not promise accommodation, financial support, legal representation or other services unless you are in a position to provide them.

If you are offering practical help, explain what you can provide, what conditions apply and what the next step would be. If you are unable to assist, a clear answer or appropriate referral is more useful than an indefinite promise.

If you are a researcher, preserve the original context of quotations and document references. If you identify an error, explain it specifically so that it can be corrected. If you wish to reproduce material, consider whether it contains personal information that should not be republished unnecessarily.

The objective is to make the record more accessible and the assistance more effective while protecting the dignity and safety of the people involved.

10.9 — The Difference Between Public Attention and Practical Help

Public attention can help a person reach potential supporters, but attention is not the same as assistance.

A widely shared link may bring readers to the archive. It does not automatically provide accommodation, food, transport, advocacy or a reliable point of contact.

Likewise, a large documentary collection may make it possible to examine a complicated history, but it does not automatically resolve every administrative question.

That is why I am making two connected requests.

The first is to examine and preserve the record.

The second is to respond to the human need.

For those who can help practically, please consider what support is available now. For those who have research or advocacy skills, please consider whether you can help make the next step clearer. For those who can share information responsibly, please direct people to the archive and the complete humanitarian appeal rather than relying on an isolated quotation.

For those who cannot provide assistance, I ask that you avoid spreading claims that go beyond the available evidence and avoid treating the existence of unresolved questions as a reason to disregard the person raising them.

I am asking for attention that can lead to something useful.

10.10 — The Final Public Statement

I have spent years trying to preserve a record that I believe matters.

I have assembled documents, organised correspondence, created indexes, published my testimony and worked to make the archive accessible. I have described the effects of prolonged hardship and the difficulties I have experienced while seeking answers and assistance.

I have done this because I believe that what happened to a person should not disappear simply because the record is complicated or because the person has limited resources to keep explaining it.

I have done this because documentary evidence deserves to be preserved and examined.

I have done this because my own testimony is part of the historical record of my life.

I have done this because my faith gives me the conviction to continue bearing witness, even when the process is exhausting.

And I have done this because I believe that public accountability begins with the ability to identify what was said, what was done, what remains unanswered and what consequences followed.

I do not claim that the mere existence of my archive settles every question. I do not ask readers to mistake my allegations for independent findings. I ask them to follow the sources, examine the documents and make careful distinctions.

But I also ask that the caution required when reading evidence should never become an excuse for indifference toward a person in need.

It is possible to scrutinise a claim and still offer a meal.

It is possible to reserve judgment on a disputed allegation and still help someone find accommodation.

It is possible to investigate an administrative record and still recognise the exhaustion of the person who has spent years trying to explain it.

It is possible to respect uncertainty without treating a person’s life as though it does not matter.

That is the response I am asking for.

Please read the archive. Please share it responsibly. Please help preserve the record.

Please offer practical assistance if you can. Please help me reach people who have the capacity to respond.

I am asking not to be reduced to a reference number, a disputed account, a website or a collection of files.

I am asking to be recognised as a human being.

The archive is here: BARRAN DODGER — PUBLIC DOCUMENTARY ARCHIVE The humanitarian appeal is here: READ AND SHARE THE MASTER HUMANITARIAN APPEAL The preservation repository is here: OPEN THE BACKUP AND PRESERVED EVIDENCE The rebuilt website is here: OPEN THE SEPARATE REBUILT ARCHIVE Truth deserves careful examination. Evidence deserves preservation. Human suffering deserves a practical response. And no person should have to become a public archive merely to make the circumstances of his life visible.

I am still here. The record is here. I am asking you to read it, to see the person behind it, and to help where you can.

End of Part Ten.
