

When a Person Stops Being “Programmable” - Identity, Institutions, and the Psychology of Narrative Control

By Richard William McLean (Barran Dodger)

Two forensic documents this article is based upon references two prophetic YouTube videos confirming corroborated significance.

There is a moment that happens in some people’s lives — quietly, without ceremony — where they stop reacting the way systems expect them to react.

No explosion.

No dramatic rebellion.

No grand public declaration.

Just withdrawal from a script that no longer makes sense.

Over the past several years, I assembled thousands of documents relating to my life, conflicts, institutional interactions, research, legal disputes, personal crises, creative work, and psychological reflections. What began as evidence collection slowly transformed into something else: an attempt to understand how identity itself becomes contested terrain.

Not only legally.

Not only socially.

But psychologically.

The deeper question became:

What happens when institutions, groups, or social systems begin defining a person more aggressively than that person defines themselves?

That question sits beneath almost every modern conflict.

The Invisible Economy of Attention

Most systems — whether bureaucratic, corporate, political, or interpersonal — operate partly through emotional participation.

They rely on reaction.

Explanation.

Defensiveness.

Compliance.

Fear.

Performance.

Once someone becomes trapped in a cycle of perpetual self-justification, they begin spending enormous psychological energy maintaining their position within someone else's narrative structure.

I came to think of this as a kind of "attention economy of identity."

The more reactive a person becomes, the easier they are to predict.

The easier they are to categorize.

The easier they are to manage.

What surprised me was discovering how destabilizing disengagement can become.

Not rage.

Not revenge.

Not counterattack.

But refusal.

A refusal to continuously negotiate one's identity with hostile or reductive systems.

The Psychology of "Identity Capture"

Modern institutions often function through categorization.

Stable.

Unstable.

Compliant.

Difficult.

Trustworthy.

Problematic.

Once a label attaches itself to a person, every future interaction risks being interpreted through that label.

Psychologists, legal scholars, and sociologists have all explored versions of this phenomenon. Erving Goffman wrote about stigma. Michel Foucault explored institutional power and normalization. Narrative psychologists study how identity is socially reinforced through repeated storytelling.

The danger is not simply being misunderstood.

The danger is internalizing the misunderstanding.

Because once a person accepts an externally imposed identity as absolute truth, self-authorship weakens.

I became increasingly interested in the distinction between:

- external narratives,
- and internal authority.

At what point does a human being stop allowing consensus reality to dictate their self-concept?

Trauma and Meaning-Making

One of the uncomfortable truths about trauma is that human beings instinctively attempt to transform suffering into meaning.

Sometimes through religion.

Sometimes through activism.

Sometimes through art.

Sometimes through ideology.

And sometimes through intensely personal symbolic systems.

Critics often dismiss these meaning-making processes as delusion, grandiosity, or self-mythology. Occasionally they are. But historically, many profound philosophical, artistic, and spiritual movements began as attempts by isolated individuals to reorganize overwhelming experiences into coherent narratives.

The human nervous system does not tolerate chaos easily.

It searches for pattern.

For significance.

For causality.

That does not automatically make every interpretation objectively true.

But it does make the process deeply human.

The Difference Between Evidence and Narrative

One lesson I learned while compiling large archives is that evidence and interpretation are not the same thing.

Documents are one thing.

Meaning is another.

A person can possess real experiences, real records, real grievances, and still construct conclusions that exceed what the evidence independently proves.

This distinction matters enormously.

Especially in the internet age, where emotionally compelling narratives often overpower careful analysis.

I began recognizing that many people — not only institutions, but individuals — build entire psychological ecosystems around stories that preserve emotional coherence.

That includes governments.

Corporations.

Communities.

Families.

And isolated individuals alike.

Everyone is narrating reality.

Why Withdrawal Changes the Dynamic

There is a peculiar psychological effect that occurs when someone stops participating in hostile dynamics.

The structure begins malfunctioning.

Many social conflicts survive through repetition:

- accusation,
- reaction,
- escalation,
- defense,
- reinterpretation,
- repetition again.

When one participant exits the loop psychologically, not merely physically, the energy structure changes.

Silence becomes disruptive.

Not because silence is always morally superior, but because many systems depend on emotional predictability.

Predictable people are manageable people.

The most destabilizing person in any structure is often not the loudest one.

It is the one who no longer reacts on cue.

Self-Trust Versus Borrowed Authority

One realization became increasingly clear to me:

Many forms of authority are socially borrowed.

Titles.

Consensus.

Status.

Institutional language.

Group validation.

These can all be useful and legitimate.

But they are still externally reinforced forms of power.

Internal authority is different.

Internal authority is the ability to remain psychologically coherent even when external validation disappears.

That does not mean believing oneself infallible.

It does not mean rejecting all criticism.

And it certainly does not mean assuming persecution whenever conflict appears.

It means refusing to outsource one's entire identity to systems that may themselves be unstable, political, or psychologically reactive.

The Modern Crisis of Narrative Sovereignty

We are entering an era where people increasingly experience reality through mediated systems:

- social media,
- bureaucracies,
- algorithmic visibility,
- institutional categorization,
- digital archives,
- and networked reputational systems.

Under these conditions, identity itself becomes fragmented and contested.

Who defines a person?

The state?

The algorithm?

The crowd?

The media?

The diagnosis?

The archive?

The individual?

I believe this will become one of the defining philosophical questions of the coming decades.

Because once human beings lose the capacity for internal self-definition, they become permanently psychologically negotiable.

Final Reflection

I no longer see my writings primarily as legal documents or spiritual declarations.

I see them as attempts to answer a question that many people are quietly struggling with:

How does a person remain psychologically intact inside systems that continuously attempt to define them?

Some people answer that question through spirituality.

Some through politics.

Some through detachment.

Some through creativity.

Some through resistance.

But beneath all of it lies the same human instinct:

The desire to preserve authorship over one's own mind.

And perhaps that is what real sovereignty ultimately means.
